Canada's Premier Golf Camp

Par Golf Camps is now entering its ninth fabulous summer as Canada's premier golf instruction organization.

Instruction is provided for beginners, intermediate and advanced golfers all under the auspices of Joshua Cooper, golf professional and coach of the Maccabi Youth Golf Team. Campers are picked up at home and brought to the campsite, an 18 hole golf course with a driving range, short game area and indoor facilities. Therefore, their is no busing throughout the day as everything is held at the same location.

Children are placed in select groups based on their age and ability. The daily routine focuses on different aspects of golf. Campers play nine holes twice a week throughout their two weeks session. One month and leadership training programs are also available.

In addition to junior camps, Par Golf hosts adult golf camps. One, two and three day golf camps are held throughout the golf season. On course instruction is a primary focus at all two and three day adult camps. Golfers learn in actual playing scenarios instead of just on a driving range.

For more information on any of our programs, visit our website at www.learngolf.com or call us at (416) 960-GOLF (4653).

Say goodbye to Lost 'n' Found

Camp enthusiast Leslie Hartsman, founder of NameLabels.com, was only 6 months old when he first went to camp. Today, still an enthusiast at 28, he's the program director at Camp Tamakwa, and intends to have his own camp someday. It was personal experience which led him to found NameLabels.com..

No matter how little clothing your child takes to camp, and no matter how distinctive the designs, colours or patterns, anything can go lost. In the laundry, it can get jumbled up with other campers' things, which is just as annoying.

So a unique name label for each garment, right down to the last pair of socks, is a great convenience for parents, caregivers and counsellors. It's also a reassurance for your child, who won't have to worry as much about losing a favourite shirt or jacket.

These labels can be ironed or sewed on. See them online at the NameLabels.com Website: www.namelabels.com, and make a secured purchase with your credit card. You can also fax, phone or write. The labels are shipped directly to you.

E-mail info@namelabels.com; or call toll-free 1-86-MY-LABELS for information.

NameLabels for name labels.

Your Name Here

Durable, printed name labels - ideal for camp, school, travel and more. Because our labels are permanent iron-on or sew-on, you won't have to replace those designer jeans or wonder if that sweatshirt will stay in the Lost & Found.

EXCITING SUMMER ACTIVITIES AT REENA

Cottage Reena 2001

Reena is once again sponsoring a Summer Cottage program during the months of July and August, for teens (over 16) and adults with a developmental disability.

This fully integrated two-week vacation package incorporates life skills and social skills-training into exciting and varied leisure/recreational activities.

The cottages are located in the beautiful and rustic Georgian Bay tourist district.

A full and exciting program is being planned.

Summer Recreation Program

NOT JUST A DAY CAMP –

Reena offers an exciting adventure for teens and young adults (from 13-21 years of ages) with a developmental disability.

Indoor sports, music, computer fun and arts/crafts are offered weekly at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre (Clark/Bathurst Street) along with community outings and swimming.

You can register for a day - a week - or the full program which runs for eight weeks throughout the summer.

Camp Moshava Canada – Camping Excellence since 1959!

Camp Moshava Canada, the only Orthodox, Zionist, B'nei Akiva camp in Canada, is situated on 250 acres of beachfront property in the beautiful Kawartha Lakes region.

Camp Moshava Canada is constantly upgrading our camp facilities and this year is no exception. An addition to our kitchen facility & upgrades to the camp's overall infrastructure are some of this year's projects.

In recent years, Camp Moshava Canada has established a reputation for serving fine food. Our 2nd service salad bar is extremely popular with the campers. No matter one's requirements, all campers' dietary needs are met.

Moshava has a Beit Midrash and an outdoor Beit Knesset, an unparalleled indoor Recreation Centre featuring regulation size basketball, volleyball and floor hockey courts as well as an indoor/outdoor stage. The camp boasts an extensive high ropes course, rock climbing wall, biking, and a ball hockey rink.

Moshava has a 2-week "splash of camp" program designed for grade 2 graduates. The camp's regularly scheduled days include instructional swimming in an outdoor heated pool, canoeing, waterskiing, a full sports program, thematic arts & crafts and drama. Special days include colour war, sports day, canoe trips, overnights, hiking, nature trips and fishing.

What makes Camp Moshava unique goes far beyond facilities, events and personalities. The atmosphere that exists amongst staff and campers is truly a special one. Only those who have actually encountered a Shabbat at Camp Moshava Canada can truly appreciate what the experience is like! Camp Moshava is not just a summer camp experience, it's an experience of a lifetime!

Bishop's College School - An unforgettable learning experience

Bishop's College School is a residential school situated in Lennoxville, Quebec, approximately 160 km east of Montreal.

The 2001 Bishop's College School summer language program (ESL or FSL) which begins on July 1 and ends on July 28, will be our 40th season.

This is a non-credit program for boys and girls ages 11-15 years. It is designed to provide an opportunity for concentrated instruction to well-motivated students interested in gaining proficiency in French or English at the beginner, intermediate or advanced levels. Courses run Monday through Saturday mornings and Monday through Thursday evenings. Teacher to student ratio, approximately 1 to 12.

The sports and recreation program is also an integral part of the formula with afternoons dedicated to supervised team sports and off-campus activities. Sundays are reserved for planned outings and cultural trips are organized as necessary extensions of the language program.

If you wish to receive a brochure and application form or would simply like further information you may contact the school in the following manner:

Hashomer Hatzair / Camp Shomria

Camp Shomria offers a dynamic and exciting summer camp experience for youths 8-16 from Canada, the U.S., and around the world. A variety of challenging sports, theme days, educational and cultural activities create an atmosphere designed to build life-long friendships. It's located on Otty Lake, a beautiful waterfront, ideal for a wide selection of fun-filled water activities.

Camp Shomria promotes deep love for Israel and the North American Jewish community. It's run by the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, established over 80 yrs. ago, and is active within the Jewish community. There are weekly activities available throughout the school year in Toronto and a 6-day residential winter camp during December. Activities include dance, arts & crafts, a dynamic drama program, hikes, trips and a rope course (see directory). Grade 10 graduates participate in a leadership training program, "Yedid Plus", which includes an intensive 5 wk. itinerary in Israel.

Staff are dedicated and committed. Most were Shomria campers. Camp Shomria has a full-time registered nurse, and many staff are trained in first aid. A hospital with modern facilities is just minutes away. To learn more about Camp Shomria, please call Noam or Miriam at 416-736-1339.

Zodiac Swim & Specialty Camp

Challenging ... safe ... fun ... amazing! ... just some of the adjectives used by campers, parents and staff to describe Zodiac Swim & Specialty Camp! At the camp's fantastic, conveniently located outdoor/indoor facilities at Forest Hill Collegiate (Bathurst & Eglinton), 6½-15 yr. old campers receive expert instruction and enjoyment in a specialty area of their choice (basketball, land sports, performing arts, tennis, science & technology, in-line skating, creatures & creativity, golf, karate, make & bake, magic and gymnastics), as well as a terrific variety of other camp activities. High quality, low ratio Zodiac Swim School swim instruction is a major focus of every camp day.

Campers aged 3½-6½ participate in the "Kid-vantage" program, enjoying a full range of age-appropriate camp programs. Directors Rick, Ellen & Andrew Howard are proud of the camp's reputation for quality programming, meeting individual needs, camp spirit, lifetime friendships and memories ... the ultimate camp experience.

Camp Shalom - Better than ever at 53

Camp Shalom is getting ready to celebrate its 53rd year in the upcoming 2001 camping season. Located on beautiful Lake Muskoka, the camp has established itself as an exceptional Zionist Jewish camp for boys and girls aged 8-13 in the Gravenhurst area of Ontario.

Shalom campers experience the joys of a terrific summer vacation, under the care of a well-trained staff, with a better-than-3:1 camper-to-staff ratio. As a not-for profit camp affiliated with Canadian Young Judaea and accredited by the OCA, Camp Shalom imbues its campers with a sense of Jewish history, cultural values and the centrality of Israel in Jewish life. The Camp Shalom ethic promotes the ideals of mutual respect, sharing and fair play in interpersonal relationships.

Camp Shalom features an individualized program wherein each child is free to choose from over 25 daily activities including canoe, sailing, ropes, baseball, basketball, tennis, inter-camp sports, archery, self-defense, gymnastics, dance, fitness, beach volleyball, mini-golf, daily instructional swim, waterskiing, kayaking, drama, arts & crafts, photography, expanded tripping program, nature, scouting, music, camp newspaper, sports house leagues, rock climbing, media program, golf activities and more. The media group updates the Camp Shalom website daily.

The Camp Shalom staff is looking forward to the upcoming summer and the privilege of sharing another wonderful season with so many fortunate campers. Come join our family!

Camps

Top camping at low costs

Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michoel Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 22 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they offer the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices are the same as last year and include door-to-door bus transportation within a designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also included are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts & crafts, weekly trips and a varied sports program. The camp is located in Eitz Chaim Schools and offers modern air-conditioned indoor facilities for rainy day activities.

A recent innovation in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are aimed at helping campers at the lower skill levels, as well.

Our older girls' division designed to meet the needs of girls grades 3-5, also offers an optional baseball camp.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms, playground equipment, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

Lynrich Arts - Fine Art Studio Camp

Camp Lynrich has been a Toronto area art supplier and educator for 22 years. For eight years, they've been running their popular Fine Arts Studio Camp for children aged seven to 16.

If your kids show artistic talent, send them to Camp Lynrich. They'll learn techniques, enhance their self- esteem, and push their creative abilities to the max. They can create a portfolio, wonderful gifts, or pieces for friends and family to enjoy.

Lynrich campers learn to sketch and draw, including cartooning, pastel, charcoal work and may also do some claymation.

Camp Lynrich teaches landscape painting (including fun tricks for making clouds and trees), and how to draw the human figure. Watercolour techniques include wet on wet, washes and dry brush. Colour mixing is taught too, as are oils and acrylics.

Campers learn to carve, create clay figures and animal sculptures, make vases, pinch pots and busts. Other crafts include paper making, papier mache, stained glass, bisque and boondoggle.

Camp Lynrich provides the best materials. The talented, experienced teachers are strong both in the arts and sociology and psychology, and enjoy working with kids.

You can choose from weekly, bi- weekly, monthly or all- summer sessions, and the new week- long cottager special. Hours are 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Pizza lunch is supplied Tuesdays and Thursdays; kids bring their own other days.

For busy parents who need to drop their kids off before work and pick them up after, there's a Breakfast Club from 8 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. An additional weekly fee applies.

You can write Lynrich Arts: 73 Doncaster Ave., Thornhill ON L3T 1L6. If you register before March 15, you'll receive 10% off.

Another exciting year at Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is a privately owned overnight camp located in the foothills of the Gatineaus, 45 minutes outside of Ottawa. We have a long and successful camping history of well over 60 years. Our camp prides itself in welcoming children from all over the world. Although we are a private Ottawa camp we treasure our many campers from Montreal, Toronto, New York, Florida, Israel and even the Caribbean.

Camp B'nai Brith has a varied program to stimulate children with many different interests. We offer an extensive number of different programs such as drama, arts & crafts, dance, tennis, basketball, miniature golf, all camp programs (Grey Cup/Super Bowl, World Cup, Colour War, etc.) and tremendous camp spirit. Our waterfront overlooking the Ottawa River has a sandy beach which is home to our vast watersports. They include waterskiing, windsurfing, knee-boarding, kayaking, canoeing, sailing and a Catamaran. Our Olympic size pool allows campers to enjoy swimming away from the hub of activities at the beach. Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is very proud of our extremely successful Red Cross aquaquest program which offers all levels of instruction up to and including Bronze Cross.

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa offers a kosher kitchen (Ottawa VAAD Kashruth) and is also a PEANUT SENSITIVE camp. In addition, we offer a Judaica program which is fun but yet traditional. This includes weekly Shabbat services. We also have an indoor gym, dance studio,recreation hall and an on-site infirmary which has a full time doctor and nurse.

One area we are most sensitive to is the anxiety of our younger campers coming to camp for the first time. To ease this situation we have instituted 2 very successful programs. Firstly, we offer our 2 wk. starter camp for new C.B.B. campers aged 7-10. The other is our Big Brother/Big Sister program which pairs younger campers with older campers prior to and during camp to help campers feel more at ease.

If you are interested in giving your child an active, stimulating and exciting summer camp experience then Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is the place to be. For more information please call Morley Mason at (613) 228-8495.

Israel camp for girls fosters individual growth

Overnight camps have long been recognized as an excellent supplement to a year-round Torah education. Camping fosters varied opportunities for individual growth. Group living, independence, formal as well as informal learning, song, dance, drama, swimming, etc. are just some of the benefits offered in this natural surrounding

But ... a new dimension has been added at N'Vei Ashdod. For the past 17 years N'Vei Ashdod has provided all these things, and more ... in Eretz Yisrael where everything takes on a special flavour.

Lively, frum girls from all over the world come to Camp N'Vei Ashdod and forge lifelong friendships. It is indeed rare to find so many girls from so many places, blending so naturally. Perhaps it is the love for Eretz Yisrael which brings them so close together.

Situated in beautiful central Israel, in a tranquil, fully enclosed, modern campus with an enormous pool, beautiful grounds and air-conditioned dining room, N'Vei Ashdod combines learning, sports, fun and excitement with extensive touring throughout Israel.

The girls travel across the country in air-conditioned buses with the finest tour guides available. The whole time, security is top priority.

Shabbos, whether in camp or outside, is particularly special; picture Shabbos in the old city of Jerusalem, or in the Ir HaKodesh of Tzfat. Guest lecturers, Talmidei Chachomim, authors and well known Torah personalities add an extra dimension to the Israel experience.

N'Vei Ashdod, the touring camp for girls ages 10-17 in Israel is now in its 17th summer.

Israelis and Palestinians now poles apart over peace

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The violent events of the last four months have created a sharp divergence in Israeli and Palestinian attitudes toward the peace process, according to studies by Tel Aviv University's Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace Research and Hebrew University's Jerusalem Media and Communications Center (JMCC).

The results of public opinion surveys carried out in Israel and the Gaza Strip and the West Bank show that the majority of Israeli Jews, 61 percent, blame the Palestinians for the resurgence of bad blood between the two peoples, while almost half, 48 percent, believe that the Palestinians are violent.

In contrast, the vast majority of Palestinians, 87.5 percent, view Israelis as a violent people, with 76 percent stating that Israel is responsible for the deterioration of relations between Israel and the Palestinians.

Similar divisions emerged on the question of what is the best way to secure a peace agreement between the two sides. Almost three-quarters of Israeli Jews, 74 percent, stated that negotiations are the best way to finalize a peace accord, while only 14 percent of Palestinians thought the same.

One-quarter of Palestinians questioned said a violent confrontation with Israel was the surest way to conclude an agreement, and 36 percent felt that it was not possible to make peace with the Israelis.

In other words, a large majority of Palestinians have adopted a pessimistic attitude toward the chances of finalizing a peace agreement with Israel, and even those who still believe that peace is possible believe that it can only be achieved through violence. This last point is reflected in the finding that 69 percent of Palestinians believe that the recent intifadah has forced Israel to recognize the Palestinians' positions on key matters and to make the necessary concessions.

The Israelis questioned, however, believe the opposite, with 53 percent saying the four months of violence have caused the government to harden its position toward the Palestinians.

The December 2000 surveys were carried out as part of the ongoing Peace Index project.

Barak apologizes for death of 13 Israeli Arabs

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak publicly apologized this past Sunday to Israel's Arab citizens for the deaths of 13 of their community killed in clashes with the police last October.

At the weekly cabinet meeting, Barak took formal responsibility for the deaths, and on behalf of the government expressed his sorrow.

"As prime minister, I have overall responsibility for all that goes on in the State during my term in office, and also for the incidents in which 13 Arab citizens were killed. On the behalf of my government and myself, I express deep sorrow for the killing of Arab citizens. In demonstrations, even if they are illegal, civilians are not supposed to get killed," he said.

The prime minister said that there are some links between the sensitivities currently felt in the Arab sector on the eve of the elections and the events of last October.

Barak directed a promise to the grieving families, of 13 Arab and one Jewish citizen killed in the incidents, saying the government would do all in its power to prevent a repetition of similar occurances.

"It is very important that Israeli Arab citizens feel this is everyone's country and that the citizens in it are all equal and that all blood is dear to us," he said.

The prime minister expressed confidence that, irrespective of what the new government will be like, "whether it is ours or another government," it would adopt the recommendations of the Public Commission of Inquiry set up to investigate the October events.

Barak also called on all citizens to make an effort to restore the delicate fabric which linked the Arab and Jewish communities together.

Lebanese daily paper persists with reports of possible prisoner exchange

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A prisoner exchange agreement between Israel and the Hezbollah is very near, according to Palestinian sources quoted last Sunday in the Lebanese daily, Al Mustaqbal.

Israel and the Iran-backed Hezbollah have been negotiating through German intermediaries of the Red Cross for the release of three Israel Defence Forces (IDF) soldiers and an Israeli civilian kidnapped by the organization last October.

In exchange, Hezbollah is demanding the release of Arab prisoners held in Israel, most notably Sheikh Abdel Karim Obeid and Mustafa Dirani. The two have been held in Israel since the 1980s as leverage for information on the fate of missing Israel air force navigator, Ron Arad, who was captured in Lebanon in 1986.

According to "well-connected Palestinian sources," the Al Mustaqbal report says the contacts between Israel and the Lebanese Shi'ite organization are continuing in an effort to release the "Lebanese, Palestinian, Arab and Iranians in Israeli prisons."

The sources expressed certainty that the results of the recent contacts between the two sides will become evident in the very near future.

On Friday, Al Mustaqbal, published a report that quoted a senior Hezbollah official as saying an exchange of prisoners is possible in a number of days.

Sunday's report quoted the Palestinian sources as saying the "Lebanon committee" of Fatah – Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's organization – and the PA's "prisoners' desk" are closely monitoring the talks between Israel and the Hezbollah.

Kollek joins outcry against Temple Mount digs

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Former Supreme Court president Meir Shamgar and former mayor of Jerusalem Teddy Kollek are the latest public figures to join the outcry against excavations by the Muslim Wakf religious trust on the Temple Mount.

The two informed the Committee to Prevent the Destruction of Antiquities on the Temple Mount that they would add their signatures to a sharp letter on the subject sent to Prime Minister Ehud Barak recently.

The letter was signed by archaeologists and by public figures from all parts of the political spectrum.

It demands that Barak immediately halt the excavation and construction work being carried out by the Waqf, forbid the entry of heavy machinery, trucks and building materials into the Temple Mount compound, and forbid the exit of trucks laden with dirt that might contain archaeological artifacts.

The letter also demands that any construction on the Temple Mount be co-ordinated with the proper Israeli authorities — primarily the Antiquities Authority, whose employees have been barred from the site for months — and that the Temple Mount be opened to journalists so that Israelis can keep abreast of what is happening there.

Shamgar confirmed he has signed the letter.

The committee, meanwhile, sent another letter to Barak stating a new aerial photograph clearly shows that another large area, of close to 1,000 square metres, is being leveled in preparation for being paved over. The leveling work involves mechanized digging to depths of up to one metre, which could destroy archaeological findings, the committee said.

"We are aware of the fact that we are at the height of an election campaign," the letter said.

"But despite our strong desire not to become a tool on the political battlefield, we cannot keep silent at a time when we are witnessing nonstop, daily work on the Temple Mount, and when you are not preventing serious damage to the site.

"The impression created is that what is done on the mount has completely escaped all control and supervision. History, and academic and archaeological research, will not forgive you if you do not halt...the terrible vandalism."

Mangling a journalist's words

Jeffrey Goldberg, a staff writer with The New Yorker, recently wrote a 14-page article, "Arafat's Gift: The return of Ariel Sharon" (Jan. 29),which has received a great deal of attention.

In the Jan. 27 Montreal Gazette, Gwynne Dyer, the well-known Canadian military and foreign affairs analyst, commented on it, but in an oddly deficient way: by mangling both parts of Goldberg's name, which emerged as "Geoffrey Goldblatt."

That error is indicative of a pattern of mistakes, as well as Dyer's entire attitude, at least where Israel is concerned. It is both sloppy and simplistic, and the two are not unrelated.

Writing under the despicable headline, "Good at Killing Arabs," Dyer not only distorts Goldberg's name but chooses very selectively from his analysis, reducing it to a black and white message that plays handily into Dyer's own thesis, namely that Sharon is a bloodthirsty butcher of Arabs.

Dyer's approach offers a glimmer of what we may expect from him in the future, assuming the polls taken at the time of this writing are accurate and Ariel Sharon becomes the next prime minister.

Yes, the hardline Sharon is there in Goldberg's piece, but so too is a more complex picture: "Sharon's record is not altogether without nuance...Under Netanyahu he agreed to withdraw from most of Hebron, and he also agreed reluctantly to the withdrawal from 13% of the West Bank...Sharon dissents from the Peres vision of the Middle East, but his dissent is not rooted in the quasi-messianic beliefs of the Greater Land of Israel movement....He is driven, instead by a belief in the immutability of Arab hatred."

Little of Goldberg's article is devoted to Sharon himself. In fact, the major theme is an accurate and balanced look at current Israeli and Palestinian attitudes following the collapse of the Camp David summit and the outbreak of violence in late September.

What certainly comes through is how disillusioned Israelis have become, including those of the left like Amos Oz, with the Palestinians resorting to violence at a time when Barak was offering unprecedented concessions.

If only Dyer had read Goldberg's piece instead of Goldblatt's.

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada Israel Committee.

Violence not Sharon's fault: Israel

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount did not cause the outbreak of violence in the territories, says Israel's statement to the international committee investigating the violence of the last four months.

The Palestinian leadership used it as an excuse to deploy violence to improve its position in negotiations with Israel, the submission says.

The report was submitted Dec. 30 – as was a Palestinian report – to the committee headed by George Mitchell, the former U.S. Senator and Northern Ireland mediator. An interministerial committee, co-ordinated by Moshe Kohanovsky, deputy director for special assignments, prepared the document.

The report notes Sharon's visit was brief – 34 minutes – and Israeli laws, including Knesset immunity and freedom of worship, left the authorities no way to prevent it. It also cites the Bible to demonstrate the more than 3,000 years of Jewish history connected to the sanctity of the Temple Mount.

Further, the document quotes a telephone conversation between Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami and Jibril Rajoub, the Palestinian Authority's head of preventive security on the West Bank, on the eve of Sharon's visit. Jibril is quoted as saying that if Sharon stayed away from the mosques on the plateau, "There won't be a problem."

The report lays the blame for all the violence on the Palestinians, and expresses Israel's sense of betrayal that the Palestinians went to war even while permanent status negotiations "were proceeding with seriousness" – albeit "slower than originally envisaged."

Israel claims the recent intifadah was "not a demonstration, or a passing venting of grievances, but a sustained and orchestrated campaign of attacks against Israeli civilians and armed forces."

The report's opening statement begins with a description of the Ramallah lynching of two reservists from a Palestinian police station, and the bloody Palestinian hands raised to the TV cameras. This is "the enduring image" of the conflict for Israelis, sending the message that the Palestinians had declared war on them.

"These are not demonstrations to convey a sense of urgency," the statement read. "This is a war. If we catch you, this is the fate you can expect to receive."

Attacking the PA, the statement says, "To seek the moral high ground by deploying children to stand in front of men with machine guns who fire at Israelis, inviting a response, is the essence of this conflict." It goes on to defend the soldiers' use of weapons as "self-defence and defence of others" and says that Israel "has been restrained in its response" to "an armed conflict."

At the time of the report, some 93 days after the start of the conflict, there had been 2,700 live fire attacks on Israelis throughout the West Bank and Gaza, an average of 28 incidents a day, including bomb attacks inside Israel in Jerusalem, Hadera and elsewhere.

Israel advised the committee it should limit the investigation to the circumstances of the violence and not try to come up with a solution to the deep conflict between the sides – and that it should avoid any suggestions for internationalizing the conflict.

On the list of Israeli recommendations for action are all the steps promised at the Paris and Sharm al Sheikh agreements, including a public Palestinian statement against violence, steps against incitement and a reduction in the Palestinian police to the Oslo-agreed 30,000.

Recently, Mitchell met U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell. Israel has heard the new administration wants the committee to go on with its work. Yet Israel has already had one run-in with the committee, forcing the resignation of Larry Pope, head of the committee's technical team, for visiting the Temple Mount without co-ordinating the trip with Israel. He was replaced by Ambassador Undine Anfay, Turkey's representative on the team.

Israel is divided on whether to resume co-operation with the committee, which it has ignored since the Pope's visit to Temple Mount. Kohanovsky, the official co-ordinating the Israeli interaction with the committee, believes it is best to wait until contacts between Israel and the United States guarantee the limits Israel wants to put on the investigation.

But Foreign Ministry Director General Alon Liel argues that after Pope's removal, contacts can be resumed gradually to prepare for a full committee visit.

It's time again for our sixth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 8. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 19, 2001. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors, such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat, Friday, March 2, 2001.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 8, 2001. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Iran ups aid to Palestinian terror groups

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran has recently increased the assistance it gives Palestinian terrorist organizations operating in the territories, the director of military intelligence told the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee recently.

This aid, which is sent via Hezbollah, consists of both training and funding, said Maj.-Gen. Amos Malka.

Iran is also continuing to support Hezbollah and has recently sent the Lebanese organization weapons that include long-range Katyusha missiles capable of reaching deep inside Israel, Malka said. In addition, Hezbollah is developing its capability for independent terrorist attacks within Israel, he said.

Malka said there is a consensus among all of Iran's political factions to destroy Israel. Iran opposes negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, he noted, and had urged the start of a new intifadah even before the current one actually broke out in September.

Iran is investing huge efforts in mending its fences with the Arab world, Malka added, but is also continuing to develop its nonconventional weapons capacity.

With regard to Iraq, Malka noted that Baghdad has been sending a few thousand dollars to the family of every Palestinian killed or wounded during the current violence. The money is transferred via an organization called the Arab Liberation Front.

Iraq has been calling for a jihad, both military and nonmilitary, against Israel, and it routinely denounces Arab states that it thinks are not doing enough on this issue, he added.

Since the UN weapons inspectors left Iraq, Baghdad has been upgrading its strategic capability, Malka said.

Malka said little about the Palestinians, apparently out of reluctance to influence public opinion so close to the elections. His only comment on the issue was that Palestinian positions did not move during the recent Taba talks: they are still demanding all of the West Bank, Palestinian sovereignty in East Jerusalem except for the Western Wall and the Jewish Quarter of the Old City, and a "right of return" to Israel for the refugees.

In related developments, the Hezbollah has recently begun operating a Palestinian terrorist cell in the Gaza Strip, according to the Israel Defence Forces.

The IDF suspects that the cell has been involved in shooting attacks and bombings in the Netzarim area, as well as firing antitank weapons.

The cell's members are apparently linked with the Islamic Jihad organization, which enjoys close ties with the Hezbollah and their joint patron, Iran. It is believed that the terrorists received funds and instructions from Hezbollah, and some may have also trained in Lebanon.

IDF sources say that the Hezbollah has recently stepped up its involvement in the territories. Particularly since Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon last May, the Hezbollah's popularity has been on the rise in the territories and it is regarded as a model for resisting Israeli occupation. During the mass demonstrations at the beginning of the current intifadah, the organization's yellow flag was prevalent.

On the other hand, despite belligerent statements from Bashar Assad, Syria is actually emerging as a force or restraint vis à vis the Hezbollah.

The IDF's assessment of a possible new round of attacks from Lebanon drew support from a Lebanese source yesterday: the Lebanese daily al-Mustaqbal quoted a senior official in the Shiite organization, saying that the Hezbollah is seeking to carry out a "high-quality action" against Israel, beyond its "routine" operations.

Still, the Hezbollah source hinted that the organization is concerned that it would be blamed for endangering the extension of UNIFIL's mandate in the event of an Israeli attack. (In fact, the UN Security Council decided last week to renew the UNIFIL mandate.)

The Hezbollah official expressed an equivocal view about Palestinian raids against Israel launched from southern Lebanon: "We cannot reject the Palestinian cross-border activities, but also cannot absolutely accept them." This matter requires "strategic research and co-ordination in accordance with a jointly determined interest," he said.

Senior Lebanese sources were quoted in al-Hayat yesterday as saying that the Syrian authorities "severely reprimanded" Ahmad Jibril, the leader of the Damascus-based Palestinian Popular Front – General Command, for launching an attack against Israel from the Lebanese border last week. (Israeli soldiers intercepted the infiltrators near Har Dov, killing two.)

According to this newspaper report, Syria informed Lebanon that it would be reining in Jibril's group. In particular, the Syrian authorities reportedly told Jibril that the attack was "not appropriate" considering the current situation in southern Lebanon.

In fact, Syria does not support Palestinian terrorist activity originating from Lebanon, according the Lebanese sources quoted in al-Hayat. In Syria's view, an effort to liberate the disputed Shaba Farms (Har Dov) area should be co-ordinated between the government of Lebanon and Hezbollah.

Amman criticizes anti-Israel unions

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

AMMAN — Jordan's government recently warned the country's Islamist dominated professional unions to stay out of politics, just days after arresting leading unionists who blacklisted people with ties to Israel.

Prime Minister Ali Abu al-Ragheb delivered the warning in a reply to parliamentary deputies over the arrest of seven union leaders behind the blacklist.

"Frankly, the role of unions should be just professional and they do not have a political role," Abu al-Ragheb told parliament. "Unions have extended their jurisdiction and acted as a government or state in Jordan."

The professional unions, dominated by Islamists and leftists, have for years opposed Jordan's peace links with Israel. Amman recognized the Jewish state in 1994.

The country's 14 unions represent more than 120,000 doctors, engineers, nurses, lawyers and other professionals. Successive governments have failed to end compulsory union membership, which is required for practicing most professions.

Police arrested the seven activists a week after a blacklist of more than 30 firms and individuals was published.

Kinneret's low level a risk to water quality

By TSAFRIR RINAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Lake Kinneret will continue to drop steeply this year to about 214.3 metres below sea level, more than a metre below the "red line" level where continued pumping risks permanent damage to the water quality, the most recent forecast of the Mekorot Water Company says.

The forecast was revised because of an unusually dry January, when only 30 million cubic metres of water entered the lake. The January average over the last 30 years has been some 80 million cubic metres. Usually, January is a critical month for determining the total amount of water to enter the lake in a given year.

One result of Mekorot's projection, if it proves true, is that Israel will not be able to transfer the water it owes to Jordan, as part of the peace agreement signed with that country. The Degania pumping station, which supplies this water, cannot reach the lake if the level falls below minus 214 metres.

Israel would therefore have to build new stations, capable of deeper pumping, in order to meet its obligations to Jordan. This work has already begun.

The situation could become even worse if a shortfall in Israel's aquifers forces Mekorot to pump more than the 235 million cubic metres it had planned to take from the Kinneret this year.

As of mid-January, the level of the southern section of the Yarkon-Taninim aquifer was a full metre below where it was at this time last year. If the water level falls too far, salt water could enter and permanently damage the aquifer.

Mekorot says the only way to prevent a water shortfall is to immediately build another desalination plant near Ashdod in order to begin supplying water next year.

In addition, new treatment plants must be set up to increase the use of waste water rather than fresh water for irrigation.

Still serving satisfied patrons after 35 years. The Lobster Trap is Toronto's original lobster house. Unique in Canada The Lobster Trap offers live lobster in the tank from one pound up to four pounds, prepared the way you like it; and the lobster bisque sets the standard for all others. Besides our delicious lobster, scampies, Alaska king crab legs, shrimps and mussels, there is also a selection of other fine fish dishes. Casual dress goes with the cozy atmosphere; and there is a special kids' menu. Lunches start at $4.95, dinners at $16.95. The Lobster Trap accepts all major credit cards.

The Palace Restaurant

722 Pape Ave. • 416-463-3393

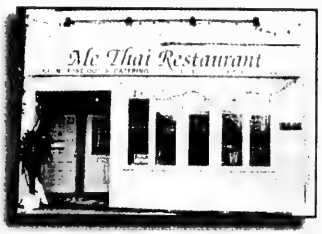
Hours: Mon.-Sat. 11a.m.-1a.m. Sunday 11a.m.-10p.m.

There's one Greek restaurant you can count on to deliver a wonderful dining experience on each and every visit — whether it's a Valentine's Day outing with your better half, or a business lunch with associates.

The appetizers alone provide more choice than some entire menus, and they stand alone in terms of freshness, preparation and authenticity. There are a plethora of superb Greek specialties, Toronto's finest selection of fresh fish, and world-famous Sterling Silver Certified Premium Beef.

As befits a Palace, there's a private Party room for up to 100 people. Located on the skylit upper level, it's ideal for birthday parties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah parties, or any event requiring the kind of ambience a banquet hall simply can't provide.

Me Thai Restaurant



3434 Bathurst St. • 416-256-7250

Hours: Lunch Mon.-Fri. 11:30a.m.-3:30p.m., Dinner Mon.-Sun. 5p.m.-midnight. Reservations required on weekends.

Finally, a true traditional Thai restaurant in the North Bathurst (401) corridor. Come in and taste the authentic, unique creations of Thai chef/owner Sasi, who has taught Thai cooking for a number of years. She cooks from scratch, uses fresh ingredients, and does not cut corners. Taste our sensuous coconut curry dishes, oyster mushrooms with scallops, cashew nut chicken, stir fry vegetarian dishes, or our wonderful mango salad. There's a family atmosphere, with a games room for kids. Parties and catering welcome. ($10 off your dinner bill for two or more guests Sun.-Thurs. if you mention this ad.)

Axcess Restaurant

3185 Yonge St. • 416-482-8485

Hours: Mon.-Fri. 12noon-3p.m., Mon.-Sat. 5p.m.-midnight for dinner. Reservations highly recommended Fri. & Sat. evenings

Axcess' cuisine highlights Continental fusion, with Asian influences, and a range of pastas, seafoods, steaks, chicken and vegetarian dishes. The venison with mushroom risotto and Calvados sauce is excellent; the ostrich with wild rice risotto and lingonberry jus is very popular. All desserts, including the classic creme brulee, are homemade; best loved is the crepe filled with frangelico hazelnut mousse. They're creating a new wine list, with a good mix of vintages. The decor is rustic and intimate, with warm colours and pictures. The cream-coloured, hand-plastered walls shimmer softly with a hint of scattered gold dust

The Silver Rail North

3 Elmhurst Ave. • 416-221-4700

Hours: Mon.-Fri. 12noon-10p.m., Sat. 5-11, Sun. available for private parties Reservations recommended

Don't forget Valentine's Day, Wed., February 14th.

What better place to celebrate?

Treat your Valentine to ribsteak, rack of lamb, surf & turf or Chateau briand for two in our beautiful oak dining room, as elegant and friendly as always.

Baton Rouge

7520 Weston Rd. • 905-265-8471

Hours 11a.m.-11p.m., Fri. & Sat. 11-midnight Reservations recommended for weekend nights. Wheelchair access. Parking in front.

Baton Rouge chooses the finest ingredients: crisp lettuces; ripe, ready tomatoes and peppers; the best of the day's catch; hand- selected prime beef. The chefs make dressings from scratch, and grill over fine hickory and aromatic hardwoods; watch them work in the open kitchens. They're finicky; each signature dish must be perfection: baby back ribs, chicken tenders light as air, raved- over dips. At well- spaced tables or tucked into intimate, oversized leather booths, the atmosphere is inviting: greenery and warm brick, burnished mahogany and brass, softly mirrored lamplight. Service is prompt and caring; you'll come back, bringing family and friends.

Pan On The Danforth

516 Danforth Ave. • 416-466-8158

Visit us at toronto.com

Hours: Sun.-Thurs. 5p.m.–midnight, Fri.-Sat. 5p.m.–1a.m.

Let Pan tempt you with the unique interpretations of Greek cuisine, emphasizing textural detail, which have made it Toronto's sole three-star Greek restaurant. A cozy, romantic ambience makes Pan the ideal Valentine's Day destination; bring someone special, who loves candlelight and gentle background music.

The cuisine is exquisitely fresh and uplifting. For starters, try a pita dip — say, tzatziki with 100% pure fresh pressed yogurt; or mussels steamed in wine, garlic, spinach, fresh herbs and cream. Robust eaters will love the hearty moussaka entrée, or rack of lamb. For something lighter, try santorini chicken, or a mouth-watering seafood delicacy like grilled sea bass.

Call for reservations on weekends.

Temporary spot as movie show's host enters into its second year

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When award-winning producer Anita Herczeg, 35, signed on to create and produce a weekly movie review show for the Lifetime Network with partner Mark Duffield, she had no intention of hosting it, too.

However, due to coincidences and an approaching deadline, the one-time.film reviewer for CBC's On the Arts with Laurie Brown agreed to host Flick – temporarily.

Yet as Flick continues in its second season, Herczeg is firmly planted in the reviewer's chair, alongside new co-host, Brent Bambury.

"It took me sometime to get used to the hosting element, since I hadn't envisioned myself as someone who looks into a camera and says, 'Don't go away,' but I'm enjoying it now," Herczeg says.

As producers, Duffield and Herczeg decide which movies to cover. "I'm drawn to the movies that I think are going to be interesting and engaging. We try to choose a mix," she says.

Herczeg and Duffield, whom Herczeg met at the University of Western Ontario, own Bamm Pictures and are currently developing their own feature films.

Flick is a fast-paced show consisting of three current movie reviews, as well as in-depth feature stories about the movie industry and its movers and shakers, and on-location interviews from film festivals and publicity press junkets.

When Herczeg enjoys a film, she lets her interviewee know, but if she dislikes the movie, she tries to come across as neutral and focus her questions about the role itself.

"I have my critical side, but generally, I want to like a movie," Herczeg says. "I don't go to a movie hoping it's bad. On one hand, I am a very critical person, but on the other hand, I have a great appreciation of what it takes to make a film and how big a deal it is to actually get something on the screen. I know that from actually making them.

"There may come a day, when I say, 'This film is terrible, how could you have chosen this?' I haven't done that as of yet," Herczeg says.

"I enjoyed meeting Annette Benning on a junket in New York for a film called Siege, which wasn't very good, but, she was very smart and friendly," she says.

On the other hand, "I interviewed Joaquim Phoenix at the Toronto International Film Festival and he was tough to interview," Herczeg says. "It was very stressful. One minute he was picking lint off my sweater and the next minute, he refused to answer my questions."

Toronto born and raised, Herczeg is fluent in Hungarian and Hebrew. She spent her childhood summers visiting relatives in Israel and decided in 1987 to complete her final year of her BA in International Relations and Middle Eastern Politics at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Herczeg returned to Canada to work in advertising before deciding to go back to school to earn an MBA. Upon completion, she went back to Israel for five months to work for the Jerusalem Report.

Back in Canada in 1992, she continued to conduct interviews for the Israeli-based publication.

During a promotion of Simcha Jacobovici's film Deadly Currents, she met the documentary filmmaker and, "He offered me a job. I trained and travelled with him as an associate producer and then producer. Then in '96, I started my own production company."

Most recently, Herczeg produced the Genie Award-winning documentary: Shadow Maker: Gwendolyn MacEwan, Poet. She was nominated for a Gemini Award for Dinner Along the Amazon for Global Television.

Other award winning documentaries and dramatic productions include A Child's Grief for the CBC and Can I Get A Witness? for the Canadian Film Centre. Herczeg was also executive producer for YTV's Hammy Hamster.

In 1998, she was a Banff Fellowship Recipient, an award given by CTV to Canada's most promising producers. Fellow recipient, Jim Ericson, now working at the Lifetime Network, caught Herczeg on CBC's On the Arts and invited her to submit a proposal for a movie review show.

Flick can be seen on the Lifetime Network every Thursday at 7:30, as well as throughout the weekend.

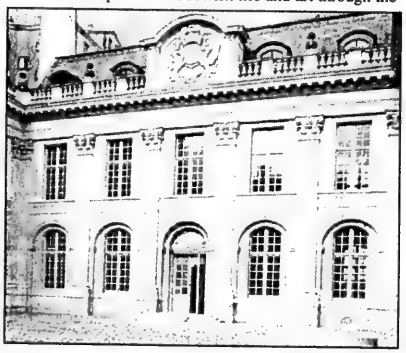
Paris: The Museum of Jewish Art and History

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

PARIS — The Marais district of France's capital city, formerly a warren of down-at-heel shops and streets, has been transformed during recent decades.

Anchored by the ever-graceful Place des Vosges, where Henry IV and his queen once lived their lives on opposite sides of the same square, the Marais is now home to trendy restaurants, cafés, and designer boutiques. But one thing about the Marais has not changed – it still forms the centre of Jewish life in Paris, with no fewer than eight synagogues, as well as famous eateries like Jo Goldenberg's Delicatessen.

The new jewel in the Marais crown is the Museum of Jewish Art and History, which opened in December 1999. Housed in a renovated 17th-century "hotel," or mansion, the Museum's history echoes that of this unique neighbourhood and its inhabitants.



The Museum of Jewish Art and History

Built for a French count in 1650, this fine example of classical Parisian architecture was sold to the Duke of Saint-Aignan in 1688, who turned it into apartments. And so the Hôtel de Saint-Aignan endured, throughout the vicissitudes of revolution and wars, until a 25-year renovation was completed two years ago.

Today's building is pale champagne in colour; its vast flagstoned courtyard welcomes visitors to the treasures within. In no way does it resemble a photograph of the same building taken in the early 20th century, a soot-stained edifice that was home to various businesses and private apartments in the heart of the Paris Pletzl (the Yiddish word for the quarter), where Jews from Poland, Russia and Hungary had long gravitated.

Rather than attempt to tell an "exhaustive, consistent story of Israel," to quote the excellent museum guide, the spacious museum highlights moments in the development of a people in exile.

Visitors to the museum are introduced to the fundamentals of Judaism, and then progress through a series of galleries, each representing a geographic region, evocative of a time and place in the Diaspora. A worthy successor to the Musee d'art Juif de Paris, established in 1948 to pay homage to a culture destroyed by the Holocaust, this museum houses its predecessor's collection of religious art and works by noted artists of the "Paris School" (some recovered from Nazi looting), including Chagall, Lipchitz and Modigliani.

Its other core collection belonged to Isaac Strauss, an Alsatian Jew who enjoyed considerable success after he moved to Paris 1827, becoming music director to the court of Louis-Phillipe. Strauss' pioneering collection of Jewish furniture, ceremonial objects and Hebrew manuscripts was acquired some years after his death by Baroness de Rothschild, who gave it to the State.

As well, the museum houses more than 3,000 documents donated by the grandchildren of Captain Dreyfus, including poignant letters between the wrongfully convicted man and his wife.

In other words, there's a lot to see here, and one visit scarcely allows enough time. The museum exudes, via its objects, a joyful expression of Jewish life and art through the ages. The introductory gallery features a 17th-century Chanukah lamp from Frankfurt-on-Main, Shanghai Torah ornaments from the 19th century, a papier-maché relief map of Jerusalem made in Odessa in 1892. A decree from 1790 declares the emancipation of the Jews (and explains why Jews long considered France a haven), a Chana Orloff sculpture from 1930 titled the "The Jewish Painter" expresses a fundamentally questioning persona, a poem by Bialik alludes to the 20th-century slaughter. The galleries then mirror the Jewish people's exodus, particularly as it unfolded in France.

From a medieval graveyard in this very neighbourhood, a group of tombstones from the 13th century occupies the centre of the second room, their Hebrew inscription translated. "Dame Florie," reads a stone from 1280, "daughter of Rabbi Isaac, departed for the Garden of Eden."

It is startling to witness the edenic heights that some communities achieved while still on earth, especially those in Italy. The museum's Italian galleries display a wealth of late Renaisance objects, including an early (1512) illuminated manuscript, paintings of weddings, circumcisions, and funerals; there is even a pair of beautifully carved and painted 18th-century doors.

There is hardly a country in Europe or the Mediterranean that is not represented in subsequent galleries. In Amsterdam the two Diasporas met, and this coming together of Ashkenazim and Sephardim merits a gallery of its own.

While wandering through these high-ceilinged rooms, visitors view the evolving art of the Jewish people as they moved from place to place, always retaining their religion and customs, while also being influenced by local artists. One memorable example is a wooden "Sukke" from late 19th-century southern Germany, painted with German-looking villages and a German-looking Jerusalem.

Unlike the plain Sukke, late 17th-century Viennese Torah covers are very ornate. Differences also appear in architecture: some wooden Polish and Lithuanian synagogues (one gallery features exquisite models of the originals) are graceful pagodas; others, fortresses designed for protection during pogroms and wars.

While there is much on display from far-flung lands – including art and artifacts from the Ottoman Empire – the galvanizing event in French Jewish life, the Dreyfus Affair, deserves and receives special attention.

Most French Jews sought to consolidate their position in France after Captain Dreyfus was pardoned, despite the rise of Zionism. Although the museum does not put the Holocaust at the centre of its focus, after the last galleries, with their paintings and sculptures by famed modern artists (who also happen to be Jewish), visitors come to a moving memorial to those who were living in this very building in 1939.

On a wall from a small inner courtyard, rising to the height of the whole building, an installation by Christian Boltanski lists each individual's name, place of birth, profession, and death date, if known.

PRIZE HONOURS SCIENTIST AND PLAYWRIGHT

The University of Toronto, Mount Sinai Hospital, Sick Children's Hospital and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care are among a group of institutions and individuals that have contributed funds to establish the new annual $100,000 Elinore & Lou Siminovitch Prize in Theatre in honour of an outstanding Canadian scientist and his late playwright wife.

Dr. Lou Siminovitch, 80, has been instrumental in the discovery of the genetic causes of muscular dystrophy and cystic fibrosis. Elinore Siminovitch, who died in 1995, authored numerous short stories and more than 30 plays, including A Man in the House, Big X and Little Y, Hannah Senesh and nine others that were produced on the stage. She often wrote on Jewish themes, and often about women struggling with adversity.

"Even though she had difficulty getting produced, she kept on writing," said daughter Dr. Kathy Siminovitch, a rheumatologist at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University Health Network in Toronto. "She wrote because she loved writing."

The national prize is believed to be the largest of its kind in Canada. It is designed to recognize an artist in mid-career who has contributed significantly to the fabric of theatrical life through a total body of work. Theatre direction, playwriting and theatrical design are to be considered in a three-year cycle, with directors as the focus in 2001. The first nomination deadline is May 4.

"This will hopefully give the field more profile and encourage the many directors, playwrights and creative artists who are trying to break into the Canadian theatre world," said Siminovitch, the second of the couple's three daughters. "It's only unfortunate to us that our mother didn't get that kind of recognition while she was still alive."

Individual founders of the prize include developer-philanthropist Joe Rotman, Torstar chairperson and U of T past president Dr. John Evans, pharmaceuticals entrepreneur Leslie Dan, members of the Tanenbaum family and several persons from the Bank of Montreal, which is the corporate sponsor of the prize.

For more details, see the Web site, www.siminovitchprize.com or write to The Elinore and Lou Siminovitch Prize in Theatre, c/o Senior Manager, Corporate Donations, Bank of Montreal, 55 Bloor St. W., 4th floor, Toronto ON M4W 3N5.

All That Glitters: The immigrant writers who came to Canada before World War II often expressed an ambivalence toward America. The reality of the sweatshops that greeted them in Toronto or Montreal clashed with the unrealistic image of the "goldene medine" (golden land) that had inspired then to come.

Adam Fuerstenberg, a Yiddish literary scholar and director of the UJA FEDERATION's committee for Yiddish, is lecturing in English and Yiddish on the topic Tarnished Gold: The Image of America in Canadian Yiddish Poetry. He offers a penetrating look into the poetry of J.I. Segal, Sholem Shtern and Judica, to reveal how their contradictory perceptions of life in the New World are reflected in their work.

Zadie's Shoes Held Over: After all those glowing reviews, it's not surprising that Zadie's Shoes by Adam Pettle has been held over an extra week. According to a theatre spokesperson, this "heartstopping comedy about the nature of luck and the power of faith" has been playing to full houses. It now runs until Feb. 11 at the Factory Theatre, 125 Bathurst St. at Adelaide. 416-504-9971.

Many Waxman films out on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Al Waxman, who died last month, was a major figure on the Canadian film, television and theatrical scene.

He headlined the first successful comedy series in Canadian television when he did The King of Kensington in the late 1970s.

He was also a regular on the American TV series, Cagney and Lacey, and he appeared in numerous television shows and feature films, both here and in the United States.

In Hollywood, Waxman was a flag-waving Canadian, and was one of the biggest boosters this country has ever had.

Two years ago, he took part in a fund-raising show for the Ashkenaz Festival, and seemed to be very happy to have the opportunity to use his Yiddish on stage.

When offered an opportunity to direct a production of The Diary of Anne Frank at Stratford last year, Waxman immersed himself in researching the play.

His production was an overwhelming success. He not only revitalized the play, he put some of the Jewish spirit back into the production.

Many of Waxman's films and TV movies are already available on video and many more will probably become available in the future.

If you're planning to visit a video store, here is a fairly comprehensive list of Waxman films that should be available in video stores across the country.

But remember that they will not all be there. Many of the films were produced a few years ago and probably have not been re-released recently.

At the same time, very few video stores carry a wide range of Canadian films, so some of those may be difficult to find:

The Hurricane (1999), with Denzel Washington; At the End of the Day: The Sue Rodriguez Story (1998); Rescuers: Stories of Courage: Two Women (1997), a TV movie about righteous Gentiles who saved Jewish lives during the Holocaust.

Iron Eagle 4 (1996), Louis Gossett Jr; Gotti (1996), Armand Assante; Bogus (1996), Whoopi Goldberg and Gerard Depardieu; Net Worth (1995), a Canadian TV movie in which Waxman gives a terrific performance as Jack Adams, general manager of the Detroit Red Wings hockey team in the 1950s, who attempted to put an end to efforts to unionize NHL hockey players.

Operation Golden Phoenix (1993), Jalal Merhi; Teamster Boss: The Jackie Presser Story (1992), Brian Dennehy, Jeff Daniels.

Millennium (1989), Kris Kristofferson, Cheryl Ladd; Switching Channels (1988), Burt Reynolds, Kathleen Turner, Christopher Reeve; Meatballs 3 (1987), Sally Kellerman, Shannon Tweed; Clown Murders (1983), John Candy; Class of 1984 (1982), Perry King, Roddy McDowall, Michael J. Fox; Atlantic City (1981), Burt Lancaster, Susan Sarandon, a classic film that won numerous international awards.

The Double Negative (1980) Michael Sarrazin, Anthony Perkins; Wild Horse Hank (1979), Linda Blair, Richard Crenna.

Simon's Rumors performed by non-Equity performers

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The 10 cast members of Rumors didn't get paid for their acting, but they still had a ball in the Neil Simon play at the Studio Theatre, which closed Jan. 28 after a sold-out run.

The playwright 's infectious humour was shared by the non-Equity performers in the not-for-profit Encore Entertainment production of the play, which presented the story of a 10th-anniversary dinner party for the deputy mayor of New York and his wife that goes awry.

Simon is a master at producing belly laughs and he gives funny lines to everyone. The actors clearly enjoyed themselves as they tried to hide several complications – the deputy mayor was not there as host because he had shot himself, his wife was missing, and the cook and the chauffeur had disappeared. Each cast member had a reason for not wanting to be associated with a scandal.

This was especially true of Mario D'Alimonte (in real life a teacher of the deaf), a close friend who carved up another party guest played by Lorn Eisen with the line: "So he's running for the state Senate; I wouldn't send him running for Chinese food."

D'Alimonte, who arrived with his head on one side as the result of a whiplash injury sustained in a car crash on his way to the party, said he hoped all the guests would be tall so he could look up at them. His BMW was so badly damaged that he was taking it home in an envelope.

His wife was played by Merle Garbe, head of Encore Entertainment, who sells real estate for a living and returned to the stage after a long absence. She clearly has not lost her touch as a comedian. The daughter of the late Jerry Simmons, one of the founders of the Mel Lastman Variety Players, Garbe has a son, Josh, following in her theatrical footsteps.

One of the best performances came from Toronto's Aaron Sidenberg as a New York policeman who tried to make sense of the strange tales told by the guests. They didn't want anyone, let alone a policeman, to know the truth.

The director, Zenon Skrypczyk, head of drama at Etobicoke School of the Arts who has directed Neil Simon plays before, had the cast dancing around the stage to loud music in their attempts to cover up.

Ultimately, D'Alimonte came up with a story that satisfied everyone. The deputy mayor, his wife, and the cook and the chauffeur turned up safely, and there was an upbeat ending.

The next Encore production will be Nunsense, May 24 to June 3 at the same location, Toronto Centre for the Arts, formerly the Ford Centre.

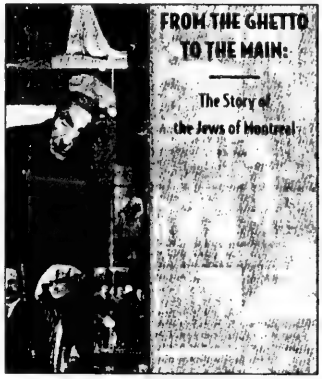
Montreal Jewish saga told in book by Joe King

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter



MONTREAL — Writing the 250-year history of Jews in Quebec has been undertaken in fits and starts by a number of scholars.

Until now, however, no one has attempted to present an overview of the community's many facets in one book.

From the Ghetto to the Main: The Story of the Jews of Montreal by Joe King is a commendable effort to record the development and diversity of a Jewish community, which at its peak was the largest in Canada and the envy of the Diaspora for its cultural richness, institutions and spirit.

King, who was communications director of FEDERATION CJA for 20 years and a veteran journalist, has managed to wrestle a mountain of disparate historical and demographic facts (the bibliography lists about 250 sources), as well as endless human-interest stories, into a readable people-oriented narrative.

That King had to work with an honorary editorial committee of 70 of some of the most prominent members of the community no doubt added to the challenge.

Certainly, almost any Montreal Jew whoever accomplished anything gets at least a mention here.

The roots of the community lay with a handful of intrepid Jews from England and France on opposite sides of the enemy line.

"In the military, they were officers and soldiers on both sides in the battle for New France. And they were prominent on the battlefield in all the conflicts following the Conquest [of 1759]."

Later, the first Jewish settlers were influential well beyond their numbers.

"Jews were founders of Canada's merchant marine. They were leaders in building the first Canadian railway, the first telegraphic service, the first banks, the first waterworks system, the first gas supply system, the first street cars, and the first electric light system in a Canadian city," King writes.

King wrote the book, which is the first "official" fruit of the nonprofit Montreal Jewish Publication Society, to illuminate what he feels is a neglected part of Canadian history.

"Montreal was and is a great city in significant measure because it was privileged to accommodate a visionary, venturesome, versatile and vibrant Jewry."

King brings to life remarkable individuals like Abraham Gradis, a Jewish merchant banker from Bordeaux, France, who is credited with saving New France from starvation in 1752. His rescue of the hungry colonists led directly to the emancipation of the Jews of France a half-century later, the first such proclamation in the world, King reveals.

Then there was Sir Alexander Schomberg, a British Jewish naval officer, who was a close adviser to Gen. James Wolfe and a key figure at the Plains of Abraham. The British victory, incidentally, opened the doors to Jewish settlement, which was forbidden under French rule.

The 350-page book contains more than 150 photos and other illustrations. Many of those from the Canadian Jewish Congress archives and McCord Museum have never been published before.

As the title implies, the heart of this story begins when tens of thousands of Jews from Eastern Europe, fleeing oppression and poverty, begin arriving in Montreal before the turn of the 20th century.

King admirably captures the determination of these people to prosper both personally and as part of a close-knit, self-sufficient community, while coping with misunderstanding, discrimination and sometimes outright hostility from the broader society.

As historian Graeme Decarie observes in the book's introduction, the difference between his working-class upbringing and that of Jews of his age (late 60s) from the area around the Main was lack of adherence or perhaps even awareness of the class system.

"We were raised to be mindful of our station in life and of our limits. In the Jewish community, there were no limitations… (i)n that Jewish district, they thought like Westmounters. Their children would be doctors and lawyers and engineers – just as if that were natural."

Of course, not all Jews were good guys. King has devoted a chapter to criminal activity among Montreal Jews titled Mayhem in the Metropolis: Gamblers, Gangsters and Gunslingers in the Dirty Thirties. It also highlights the 40-year career of detective Ben Greenberg, one of the few Jews with the city's police.

The chapter goes beyond the '30s up to the official inquiry into organized crime in the '70s and its exposure of the Jewish underworld.

Later chapters examine the changes in the community's composition with the influx of French-speaking Sephardim and the growth of the Chassidim, and the exodus provoked by the rise of separatism.

The Jewish population has fallen from a peak of 114,000 in 1971 to about 92,000 in 1996, and Jews continue to leave, the book stressed.

"(C)ommunity leaders are challenged by the difficulty of maintaining its population when a number of circumstances conspire to drain away some of Montreal's brightest…

"Imaginative programs to keep young people home have been introduced but have been only partially successful… With limited funds, an aging and shrinking community, and government support being reduced, significant change is inevitable," King predicts.

Events beyond the community's control will likely determine whether the community can renew itself or the decline will continue, he notes.

Taking a stroll down the once-Jewish area of Philadelphia

By BARBARA KINGSTONE
Special to The CJN

PHILADELPHIA — Along a street lined with federal revival houses from the early 1700s is the Society Hill Synagogue.

This is my first stop on a "walking tour" in the city's once predominately Jewish area where, within an eight-block area, there are eight synagogues. The Society Hill Synagogue is at 418-426 Spruce St.

The synagogue's front doors are still locked but since the shul has a children's day school, I imagine someone will appear soon. In the meantime, I read the large plaque which says this building was designed in 1849 by Thomas Walter.

The classical building is massive and beautiful, with a vanilla-coloured edifice. Originally, the structure featured two towering cupolas. For 81 years, it served a Baptist congregation. The cupolas have since been removed and the congregation has changed.

By 1910, with the influx of Eastern European Jews into the city, there was a need for a community prayer house. In time, the building would become home to three Jewish congregations: Beth Hamedresh Hogodol and Nusakh Ashkenas from 1911 to 1915, the Great Romanian Synagogue from 1916 to 1967 and, in 1967, it became the Conservative Society Hill Synagogue.

Today, the shul, unaffiliated with the United Synagogue Society of American, has approximately 325 members who decide amongst themselves how it should run.

Someone finally appears. A friendly woman, who has been with the shul for decades, asks if I would like to see the interior. Inside, I'm surprised by the total lack of decoration – no embellishments, no wall murals. The congregation, it seems, merely wanted a "meeting house." Even the zodiac, which once surrounded the ceiling fixture, no longer exists. The only indulgence is the recently widened bimah once "too narrow for brides with wide gowns."

Within an eight-block area, there are eight synagogues

The one kitschy touch that remains from the early days is the gilt lions above the arch. Their eyes light up when the lights are turned on.

A short walk from here is The Center for Advanced Judaic Studies (420 Walnut St.), financed by the philanthropic billionaire, Walter Annenberg.

The centre, affiliated with the University of Pennsylvania, is on the university grounds. On the ground floor, behind locked doors, are some of the most significant Judaica artifacts in the world. A treasure trove of document fragments from Egypt's Genizah is displayed in this inner sanctum, including fragments from a 10th-century Haggadah. On the upper levels of this multi-storey building are a further 180,000 volumes and manuscripts in 20 languages.

The building that now houses the Kesher Israel Synagogue on 412 Lombard St. started as the Universalist Church in 1796. By 1887, it was converted to a small shul, and in 1894, it became the Kesher Israel Synagogue, founded by Russian Jews.

After some refurbishing was done, beautiful blue and white tiles were discovered under the brown ceiling. The chandelier, dating from the late 1800s, was salvaged, redipped and re-hung. Most unusual in the interior are Morris Balk's folk art paintings, which replicate the building's original murals. One of the most attractive details is the curved balcony, where the women sat. Today, men and women sit together.

It is a perfect day for walking and soon I'm in front of the Orthodox B'nai Abraham Synagogue at 527 Lombard St., which was initially the First Colored Wesley Methodist Church. After the building was renovated, 17 Lithuanian Jews moved into it in 1885.

The large, colourful stained glass window first appears elaborate, a contrast from the synagogue's simple benches and floors. Upon closer inspection, however, I see that it is set in concrete, which gives the illusion of a grander size.

From its inception, B'nai Abraham was a central meeting place for Jewish community discussions. Today, the shul has a growing membership.

At 508 Pine St., among a series of row houses, is the Vilna Shul. Only 18 feet wide, the building was once a private house reminiscent of an old shtiebl in Eastern Europe. Yet the shul's membership grew, and in 1922, an addition was built in the rear.

But as the wealth of the Jewish Society Hill community increased, and as the Jewish population subsequently headed to the suburbs, the Vilna Shul's membership waned.

Nevertheless, when water damaged the building a few years ago, private grants were donated to build new roofs. Today, the building retains its allure with a women's balcony with a fine banister, colourful stained glass windows, heavy dark wood benches and an embossed tin ceiling. The only things that has changed is that the balcony is no longer in use; men and women now sit downstairs, separate, but together.

Home for Jewish disabled opens in Vancouver

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A young man with Tourette Syndrome rose during a Jewish Federation task force meeting on disabilities in the early '90s and accused the community of not doing enough for Vancouver's disabled Jewish population.

Ava Lee Millman Fisher remembers it like it was yesterday.

"My son Jori stood up and said, 'We have the Louie Brier home for the elderly but nothing for young Jewish adults with a myriad of disabilities and we need something,'" Millman Fisher recalled.

Eight years later, Jori Fisher's vision of a kosher group home for disabled Jews has been realized.

Yaffa House was officially dedicated and opened with a mezuzah ceremony in Vancouver's east side on Jan. 21. It has a capacity to house five people, and the first residents are currently being selected. They are slated to move in in late February.

Robert Fisher, Jori's father and past president of the Vancouver Yaffa Housing Society, the organization formed after the federation's disability meeting in 1993, said this first group home has been a long time coming.

"It's only a beginning," Fisher said. "We know there are dozens of disabled adults in Vancouver, some of whom live in very poor circumstances with no access to the Jewish community. That's what our society wants to deal with."

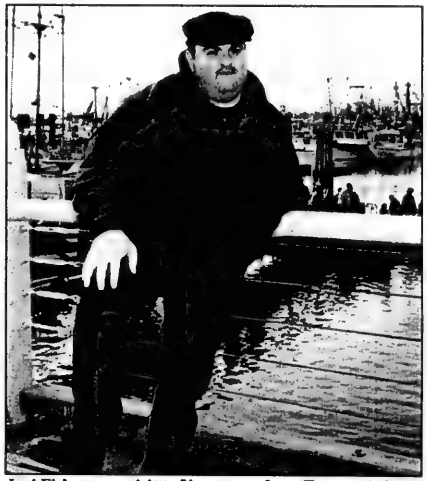
Although the support and community interest were greatly welcomed, the Fishers were not prepared for the response garnered by their son's words at the task force meeting. The following evening, the Fishers hosted a meeting in their home, with a wide spectrum of Jewish individuals present: interested community members and health care workers; mothers, fathers and friends of people with disabilities or psychiatric disorders such as schizophrenia and bipolar disorder.

"Some of the parents who were aging just didn't know what to do. Some of the stories that the parents told were absolutely heartrending," Fisher said.

Within days, the Fishers had collected about 30 names. They decided to form a non-profit society that would, among other objectives, attempt to create a number of Jewish group homes.

"Little did we know that it would take Vancouver Yaffa Housing Society six or seven years to get our first home, a culturally Jewish home. And it's not an institution. There's no plaque outside – it's a home," Fisher said.

He added that the goal of opening the first house couldn't have been fulfilled without the help of the Vancouver Resources Society, which works with people in wheelchairs; the Coast Foundation, an organization which provides homes for about 500 people with developmental disabilities; the Richmond/Vancouver Health Board; and the Greater Vancouver Mental Health Services Society.



Jori Fisher on a visit to Vancouver from Toronto (where he now resides).

In addition to Yaffa House, the Vancouver Yaffa Housing Society created the Bagel Club almost immediately after its incorporation in 1993. Based on the organization of the same name in Toronto, the Vancouver Bagel Club provides a network of assistance as well as a social environment for young adults with disabilities and their parents. These young Jewish adults have been meeting, networking and socializing there for six years.

"Originally, there was no public awareness of the young Jewish adults with disabilities in this city – and that's changed," Millman Fisher said.

And what about the young man whose words sparked the society and its ventures?

"Jori is now 29 and living in Toronto again because the resources are much better for him there," his mother said. "He loves Toronto and is doing extremely well there. He just feels the disabled are greatly neglected here."

Showing faith on the basketball court

By MIKE ROSENBAUM
Special to The CJN

BALTIMORE — Most Jews in college or professional sports prefer to be high-profile athletes, not high-profile Jews. They'll gladly speak to reporters from Jewish publications and will answer questions about their Jewish identity. Generally, however, a Jewish athlete will say that he'd rather be known as a player, not as a "Jewish player."

Tamir Goodman

Tamir Goodman is different.

"I am a basketball player, and that's something that's hard to do," says Towson University's freshman guard. "You want people to know you're the best basketball player you can possibly be. But at the same time, I know it's my faith that got me where I am today. And I've got to thank God for that. I've got to acknowledge that."

Indeed, Goodman's high profile is due as much to his Orthodox Jewish faith as to his basketball ability.

The Baltimore native began playing at age eight. By the time he was a sophomore at Talmudical Academy he realized he could be a Division I college prospect.

As a high school junior, Goodman was one of the Baltimore area's highest-scoring players, averaging over 35 points and seven assists per game. He played his senior year at Takoma Academy – a Seventh-Day Adventist school that observes the same Sabbath as do Jews – because the school plays a higher calibre of basketball than Talmudical Academy. Goodman averaged 25 points and nine assists per contest as a senior. Last summer, he played in a high-level league that included the Milwaukee Bucks' Sam Cassell.

During his junior year, Goodman was offered an athletic scholarship by Maryland, which competes in the Atlantic Coast Conference, one of the college basketball's strongest conferences. Goodman verbally accepted the scholarship offer only after he informed the school he wouldn't play, practice or travel on Shabbat.

The idea of an Orthodox Jew combining top-level college basketball with his religious faith drew national attention. He was profiled in Sports Illustrated, on ESPN and on 60 Minutes.

Early in his senior season, however, Goodman changed his mind about attending Maryland. "It was just a situation where I didn't think it would work out," he said.

According to a New York Times article, Goodman played with an injured knee during a scrimmage against some Maryland players. Afterwards, Maryland Coach Gary Williams told Goodman that the school would honour its scholarship offer, but Williams discouraged Goodman from accepting it. "We called him in and said we would still honour the scholarship, but would he be happy not playing?" Williams was quoted as saying.

Today, neither Goodman nor Williams talks much about the situation. "I had to do what was best for me," Goodman explained. "The way it turned out, it was what was best for me and it was best for them. It's good that it happened at that time and it's over with. It's something that I never, ever, ever think about."

Later, during Goodman's senior year, Towson Coach Mike Jaskulski stepped into the breach and offered Goodman a scholarship. Towson is a Division I school that plays in the America East Conference and is located near Baltimore. Towson not only accepted Goodman's religious needs, but re-arranged its schedule to avoid any Shabbat conflicts this season.

Even more, the Tigers don't schedule full-scale practices on Shabbat. Occasionally they hold walk-throughs to review plays, which Goodman will watch.

Towson has already been rewarded for accommodating Goodman. The addition of a nationally-recognized local player has helped the school, which generally sells about 25 season tickets, to sell over 200 this year.

Goodman began his freshman season by coming off the bench, but he earned the starting point guard position in Towson's third contest. He plays over 20 minutes per game and, through Feb. 4, averaged 5.3 points and 3.9 assists per contest while serving as the Tigers' floor leader.

It's a change from his role in high school, where he was always the primary scorer. But he has no complaints.

"I've always been a player who would do what's best for the team," he said. "At Talmudical, in order for us to win, I had to shoot 25 times a game. That was what the coach said. Here my role is a little bit different… I realize that and I try to get everyone else around me on the same page. And we can all have a lot of fun. We have four players averaging over double figures [in scoring]. I like that. I love that everyone's working together and that really makes us really tough to guard. And some nights I do score… You always want to get the ball to the hot man. And if that's my role right now, then that's my role… I'll gladly take it."

Of course, Towson's basketball program has had to adjust to Goodman as well. Jaskulski discussed Goodman's religious needs with Towson's players before Goodman was offered a scholarship. The team responded positively.

"It's unbelievable," Goodman said. "I can never thank them enough for that or thank the America East League enough for all they've done for me. And I try to pay them back as best as I can. The kids here, they asked [our] coach to recruit me and he did that. We threw all the cards out on the table, handled what we had to handle and we made the best situation out of it. And I think because of that, it's helped me get along with them as well as I do."

Many have doubted that Goodman could – or would be permitted – to balance basketball with his faith. But Goodman believed.

"I knew from the get-go that the only way I'd get through it is with God's help, that sticking strong with my faith was the only way to survive balancing the two. And it has been."

How does he feel about being a Jewish role model?

"That's there. Whether I want that or not, that's there. So I'm going to do the best I can to bring a sense of pride. I love that I'm Jewish, I'm very proud of it, I'm not going to shy away from it. And if I can express it through basketball, that's what I'm going to do."

Goodman appreciates the attention he receives from the Jewish community in Maryland. On the road, he gets help maintaining his kosher lifestyle.

"Everywhere I go, the Chabad community helps me out. It's just a great feeling… They bring me kosher food and they do everything they have to do to help me out."

During a Dec. 27 contest played at the University of Michigan, Goodman put all his skills on display. With a light blue kippah pinned to his close-cropped red hair, he played with flair and confidence, dishing out three assists and sinking five shots, including a three-pointer. His flashiest play came late in the game, with Towson trailing by two points. Goodman grabbed a rebound and brought the ball up-court, seemingly at full speed. At the top of key, he spotted a small seam in the Wolverines defence and shifted into high gear, driving through the lane to complete his end-to-end rush with a flying layup.

The other Jewish player in uniform that day, Michigan's Ron Garber, was impressed with Goodman's play.

"He's tough. He's really steady," Garber said. "He didn't make any mistakes out there that I can think of… He's deceptively quick, too, which you wouldn't expect right away by looking at him, but then he makes a quick move to the basket and gets by a defender. He can finish, too. It's tough to stop him."

Garber and the Wolverines edged Goodman's Tigers, 73-71, but Towson is on its way to a respectable season. After finishing 11-17 last year, the Tigers are 10-12 overall, 6-7 in conference play, through Feb. 4.

Goodman's goal for this season is to win the America East Conference. He also hopes to compete for the United States in this summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel. Though eventually, he'd like to play professional basketball, perhaps in Israel, he isn't looking to the NBA at the moment.

"I don't think about anything like that. Right now, I just want to be the best collegiate basketball player I can be."

Point guard Tamir Goodman is Towson's floor leader.

About Teens

Dear Karilani

Dear Karilani,

Lately, my teacher and I really haven't been getting along. At the beginning of the year, we would just get into good-natured debates, but after a while, she started yelling at me every time I put up my hand to say something. Now she snaps at me and says things like, "Oh, look who has something to say for a change," and "You know, it wouldn't kill you to give somebody else a chance to speak." This really hurts me and I honestly don't know what to do.

— Disenchanted

Dear Disenchanted,

When things like this happen, it's hard to know what to think. No matter what the circumstances, the teacher is in an authority position in a teacher-student relationship and has no right to offend you.

However, before you say anything to your teacher, you should ask yourself honestly whether you could have said or done anything to offend her. Go over in your mind the conversations you've had with her and try to remember if she had a negative reaction to anything you said. If you come to the decision that you did in some way offend her, then go up to her and very nicely ask if what you said bothered her. If she says yes, then apologize. If she says no, then say, "Oh, good, I was just making sure," and ask her why she has been angry at you.

However, the truth is that the teacher is still the one at fault. She is an adult and is expected to be mature. If you offended her in any way, she should have been the one to speak to you about it, not the other way around.

Still, she is your teacher and you do have to try and get along with her. So if you decide that you haven't said anything that may have bothered her, then go up to her after class and ask her why she always seems angry at you.

When you do this, it is extremely important to be very calm and unimposing in order to keep her from becoming defensive. If she becomes defensive anyway, tell her you were just concerned about it and you didn't mean it in a harsh way. It is possible that she will deny the fact that she has been snapping at you. If this happens, it is essential that you hold firm. Don't just say, "Oh, well it seemed like you were angry with me," and walk away.

I really hope that this has helped you and I hope your teacher responds well. Above all, remember that you have every right to speak to her about this problem. Good luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Power changes hands

Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon and outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak met at the prime minister's office last week to discuss the transfer of power. It was their first meeting after the election. Sharon stated he hopes to complete his coalition talks by the end of this week and then present his new government to the Knesset for approval. His first preference, he said, is for a national unity government. Please see related articles on pages 4, 8, 3, 33 and 34. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Sharon's early test

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Ariel Sharon and Yasser Arafat face two problems when Sharon becomes prime minister of Israel.

One is deciding the point at which to start the diplomatic negotiations. Is the starting point the signed agreements – from Oslo, Taba, Hebron, the Wye Plantation and Sharm el-Sheikh – as Sharon says, in spite of the fact that he does not like the Oslo agreements?

Or, on the other hand, are the understandings – if any were reached at Camp David and at the last meeting in Taba – the valid place to start (including here Clinton's bridging proposal)? In spite of the fact that at these meetings, the Palestinians refused to accept or to sign on any dotted line, and even criticized them all, including Clinton's suggestion, the Palestinian leaders are interested in these understandings as starting points.

The second problem is whether or not negotiations should take place at all while the violence continues.

Ehud Barak demanded a ceasefire as a condition for negotiations but later rescinded this demand. Some in the Israel Defence Forces have said that it's possible to live with the violence, on condition that they are also permitted to initiate military actions. Now Sharon is returning to the original precondition for talks set by Barak, and we can only wait to see how long he sticks by it. This is the first test that Sharon has set for himself.

Meanwhile, the Palestinians have developed a theory, according to which they try to have the best of both worlds – holding negotiations while also attacking Israel.

Not only does Marwan Barghouti, the head of the Tanzim, say this, but so too does Nabil Sha'ath, who generally appears in a moderate guise. This is why Arafat rejected the proposals of the Paris meeting, in which the presidents of the United States and France took part, and why he rejected the decisions at the Sharm el-Sheikh conference by former U.S. president Bill Clinton and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak regarding a ceasefire.

This is also why he has not kept his promise to Shimon Peres, who went to Gaza to confer with him, and why he has disparaged the requests for a ceasefire by the former chief of staff, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak.

Dry Bones
MR ARAFAT, YOU WANT TO RESTART THE NEGOTIATIONS FROM WHERE THEY ENDED?
YES.
YOU MEAN JUST AFTER BARAK MADE UNPRECEDENTED CONCESSIONS
AND JUST BEFORE YOU RESPONDED WITH STONES AND GUNS AND LYNCHMOBS AND WAR?

The News in Brief

CANADA

CIDA's Map

OTTAWA — The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) has promised to correct a map on its Web site that is missing Israel. The map of Africa and the Middle East lists Arab nations, as well as "the West Bank and Gaza," but not Israel. In a recent statement, CIDA, which has channeled over $130 million in humanitarian aid to the Palestinian Authority, said those responsible for the map are aware of the omission "and are working on the correction," adding, "We sincerely apologize."

New High School

VANCOUVER — Vancouver Talmud Torah has merged with the Vancouver Jewish High School. The combined facility, called Talmud Torah High School, offers a complete Jewish education from preschool to Grade 12. Community leaders hailed the merger as historic.

Bingo Fraud

TORONTO — A Toronto-area man has been convicted of running a fraudulent bingo in the name of a well-known lodge of B'nai Brith Canada. Harvey Kosloff, 54, of Richmond Hill, was sentenced to 18 months of house arrest for defrauding the public of $136,000 raised in bingos run under the name of Canyon Lodge. The offences allegedly took place over a five-year period. Police say only half the cash has been recovered. The lodge, which has about 30 members whose main activity is baseball, did not receive any of the funds. The Crown dropped a charge of defrauding the public against Kosloff's wife, Rosemary.

ISRAEL

Request Denied

JERUSALEM — An Israeli judge last week refused to allow slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassin out of jail to attend his sister's wedding. The judge said the presence of Yigal Amir, who killed Rabin in November 1995, and his brother, Hagai, at the wedding could create a security threat. And in one of his last acts in office, former prime minister Ehud Barak ordered the education ministry to terminate the employment of Margalit Har-Shefi, who was convicted in 1998 of knowing of the plot to assassinate Rabin and failing to prevent it. The move followed the disclosure that Har-Shefi has been working as a substitute teacher.

Incentive For Intel

JERUSALEM — Israel's finance minister signed an agreement last week outlining the government's willingness to provide some $440 million to chipmaker Intel if it builds a $3.5-billion plant in the Jewish state. Avraham Shochat said if Intel goes ahead with the new plant, it would be the largest investment ever made in the Israeli economy.

Chrétien Congratulates Sharon

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and his new Israeli counterpart had an amicable and relaxed telephone conversation last week, according to Chrétien's communications director, Françoise Ducros.

During the six-minute call, Chrétien congratulated Ariel Sharon on his convincing victory and urged him to press on with the peace process, Ducros said.

Commenting on the outcome of the Israeli election, Chrétien said he had "no judgment to pass at this moment. We'll have to see what kind of government he's forming and what will happen."

Chrétien added he hopes Sharon "will still work on the peace process there."

Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley also played his cards close to his vest, saying, "We'll see what happens. Mr. Sharon's first task, I think, is to form a government."

Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, offered his congratulations to Sharon on behalf of Canadian Jewry.

WORLD

Papon Protest

PARIS — Some 200 Holocaust survivors and members of Jewish groups gathered outside a Paris prison last week to demand that a Nazi collaborator remain behind bars. The demonstration came amid debate in France over whether Maurice Papon, 90, should be freed because of his age and poor health. Papon is serving a 10-year sentence after he was found guilty of helping deport some 1,500 Jews to Nazi death camps during World War II.

Swiss List

BERN — Four years after publishing a list of dormant accounts that may have belonged to Holocaust victims, Swiss banks last week posted a list of some 21,000 additional war-era accounts. The list is posted at www.dormantaccounts.ch. Last month, New York's top banking regulator called on Swiss banks to open their entire database of accounts – some 4.2 million in all – that may have belonged to survivors.

Theme Park Flap

ORLANDO — Jews in Florida are protesting a new religious theme park they say promotes Christian messianism. The Holy Land Experience in Orlando features a show depicting the rituals and prayers of Yom Kippur, but concludes with a Nativity scene projected above the audience. The park is operated by a Jewish-born Baptist minister.

Internet Café

PARAMARIBO, Suriname — The Jewish community in this South American nation is allowing one of the oldest synagogues in the Western hemisphere to be used as an Internet café. "We had to do this to save the synagogue," which is plagued by high maintenance costs and low attendance, lamented community member Dennis Kopinsky. He said the Sedekwe Shalom congregation has only about 60 members, who now worship at the other synagogue in Paramaribo, the capital.

Young gets A-G post in Ontario cabinet shuffle

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario has its second Jewish attorney general in recent years.

In a cabinet shuffle last week, Premier Mike Harris named Willowdale MPP David Young as the province's top law enforcer, as well as minister responsible for Native affairs.

Young's predecessor in the riding, Charles Harnick, also held the attorney general's job in the first Harris government and often drew fire from the Jewish community for appearing soft on hatemongering and neo-Nazi activity, especially on the Internet.

"I'm very honoured," Young, 43, told The CJN last Friday. "I really feel privileged that the premier has placed this trust in me."

Young is a relative neophyte in the legislature, having been an MPP for just 20 months. Last week, he was busy studying briefing books on both portfolios.

"I've also made calls to Native leaders and to the chief justices [of Ontario's courts] to commence a dialogue."

A lawyer, Young litigated for 18 years before becoming a North York Public School Board trustee from 1991 to 1997. He was part of the Conservatives' second straight majority victory in the June 1999 election. His win was not considered a big surprise. But Young's margin of victory was not overwhelming; he outpolled his Liberal rival 22,000 to 18,500 votes.

David Young

He became one of three Jewish MPPs (and the only one in government), joining Liberals David Caplan and Monte Kwinter. Almost immediately, Harris appointed him parliamentary assistant to the minister of education, and Young got a first-hand glimpse at the controversy swirling around Ontario's refusal to help fund Jewish day schools.

Last year, he was named parliamentary assistant to the finance minister and took credit for helping to balance the budget.

As the lone Jewish representative in government, Young has often been a lightning rod for the community's frustration when it comes to Queen's Park's stance on the funding of private, faith-based schools.

Late last month, he was on the hot seat at a meeting of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region executive. He urged the community to take advantage of Harris's planned public consultations to press the case for private school funding, saying that if the issue is presented forcefully enough, it could become a priority in the next election, slated for 2003. (CJN, Feb. 8.)

But not everyone was buying Young's message, noting the community's patience on the issue is wearing thin.

The new cabinet minister is aware of the community's frustration, and of its concern when it comes to Web-based hatred.

"It's been the focus of our attention, and it will continue to be," Young said.

Other priorities include increased policing and more support for victims of crime. Young also plans to continue the province's crackdowns of computer crime and organized crime.

Young, a board member of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, has always made a point of defending Harris before the Jewish community, noting that Ontario was only the second government in the world, after Israel, to pass a law marking Holocaust Remembrance Day on Yom Hashoah.

His parents, Jack and Estelle, helped found Beth David Synagogue. Jack Young was a Warsaw-born bandleader at a time many Toronto clubs did not admit Jews. That's why the family name was changed from Yashinsky.

Young has been married to Ellen Turk for 20 years. The couple, members of Beth Radom Congregation, have three children: Sara, 15, Cory, 13, and Alycia, 10.

From the editor's desk

Judge them by their words, too

Words are precious. They have the power to heal or to harm, to inspire or to deflate. The wisdom literatures of different cultures and societies usually acknowledge this.

All of us are familiar with any number of aphoristic sayings that point to the importance of the words we use in our daily lives. For example, "The pen is mightier than the sword," is a much championed theme of western liberal societies. Or, "A word fittingly spoken is like apples of gold in settings of silver," is an ancient proverb attributed to Solomon, which resonates no less urgently today than it did 2,500 years ago.

Even though we usually test the intentions of another by his or her deeds, we are fully justified in forming conclusions about those intentions by measuring their words.

Thus, it is instructive to read some of the words spoken last week in the wake of the election of Ariel Sharon as prime minister of Israel.

* * *

The most surrealistic, topsy-turvy, morally-inverted statements about prime minister-elect Sharon emanated, not surprisingly, from leaders who prohibit free speech and abjure the unfettered exchange of ideas for their own people.

In Syria, the official government newspaper, Al-Baath, wrote the following: "It is now sure that the Israelis are going to wake up on Wednesday to find their parasitic and racist entity headed by a man unanimously considered to be the greatest symbol of racism, terrorism and criminality in modern times."

Though not new, the giant-sized contempt saddens nevertheless. The words say a great deal about the people who wrote them, obviously determined to perpetuate only ignorance of and hatred toward Israel.

They also say a great deal about the people for whom they were written, people who are seemingly forever doomed to live under the stifling totalitarian control of a government whose forebear regime, some 20 years ago, sent Syrian soldiers to slaughter as many as 20,000 fellow countrymen in the city of Choms for deigning to protest domestic policies.

In Nablus last week, Hussam Khader, the leader of the PLO's Fatah militia said, Sharon "cannot get rid of the peace process. He will have to change his rhetoric and face reality."

But Sharon has never said he wants to "get rid of the peace process." To the contrary, his very first words after the election were to reiterate the importance of the peace process.

And what is the "reality" that Khader urges Sharon to face? Is it not the reality of a low-level war being waged by Fatah, the Tanzim, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and Hamas against Israel? How absurd is it to speak of a peace process which Khader and his colleagues have all but demolished by the violence of the current "reality" they have created?

Closer to home, the Globe and Mail reported last week in Ottawa that some federal Liberal MPs lobbied the government not to "continue business as usual with Israel" and that it "shouldn't welcome Mr. Sharon to Canada because of his reputation as a hardliner with blood on his hands."

"We shouldn't put out the red carpet for anyone like that," said Sarkis Assadourian.

Such statements by the Liberal cadre were misguided and hypocritical.

They were misguided because the election of Ariel Sharon was the manifestation of the collective will – properly, democratically expressed – of the people of Israel. An aspersion on that result is an aspersion on the process itself. Israel is deserving of better treatment than that, generally, as a fellow democracy to Canada and the only democracy in the entire Middle East, but specifically in the context of the current, post-Camp David violence.

The statements were also hypocritical. Ariel Sharon's history does not begin with Sabra and Shatilla. He is a bold, valiant warrior who has fought for Israel's survival all his adult life, in all of Israel's battles, to ensure its existence. Does the blood on Sharon's hands stain more deeply than that on Yasser Arafat's hands? Yet we do not recall these MPs urging the government not to do business as usual with the PA or with the PLO.

We are pleased the government rejected the counsel of these Liberal MPs.

Ariel Sharon is now the duly elected leader of the State of Israel. The Arab world, and it would seem, a handful of Canadian parliamentarians as well, must reconcile themselves to that fact. Ironically, it appears Yasser Arafat has already done so. Last week he sent Sharon a letter of congratulations.

Reconciliation between the people of Israel and their neighbours can only be achieved after a reconciliation of attitudes. Sadly, the events of the past four months prove there has not been even the beginning of a reconciliation of the Palestinians' attitudes towards the Jews.

Such a beginning would require the truly courageous use of words by Palestinian and other leaders in the Middle East. They could start by urging their followers to put down the sword in favour of the pen.

How fitting such longed-for words would be.

Compensation available for Jewish Austrians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Roughly 500 Jews of Austrian origin living in Canada are eligible to receive compensation payments from Austria following the signing of an agreement in Washington, D.C. last month.

The accord, sealed on Jan. 18, was signed by, among others, Austria, the United States, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany and Austria's Jewish community.

Ratified by Austria's parliament on Jan. 31, it obligates Austria to disburse $210 million (US), plus about $20 million in interest, to Holocaust survivors who were born or resided in Austria prior to World War II.

Survivors who lost businesses, property, moveable property, bank accounts, stocks, bonds, mortgages and insurance policies may file restitution claims.

Wolfgang Spadinger, a diplomat at Austria's embassy in Ottawa, estimated that payments will average out to about $7,000 (US) per eligible person.

Disbursements will begin after U.S. class action suits launched by Austrian Jews against Austria are withdrawn or dismissed, probably some time this year, he said.

After Austria was annexed by Germany in 1938, Austrian Jews were subjected to a litany of discriminatory measures.

They were also dispatched to labour camps and then to concentration camps.

Tens of thousands of Austrian Jews died during the course of the war.

In talks late last year, Austria offered a $150 million package to settle all outstanding claims.

"We said the offer wasn't adequate," said a spokesperson at the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

This being the case, a new round of negotiations began, culminating in January with an agreement.

Austria has also agreed to pay $100 million in social welfare benefits to Austrian Jews so as to ensure the continuity of the Jewish community.

Once 180,000-strong, Austrian Jewry has dwindled to about 15,000. Included in this figure are recent arrivals from the former Soviet Union.

In addition, the Austrian government has agreed to pay $395 million to some 150,000 former slave and forced labourers.

As well, the Bank of Austria put up $45 million to settle claims for lost deposits.

Altogether, in the past year or so, Austria has agreed to pay out $900 million to settle all claims filed since the end of the war.

These agreements, Spadinger said, are designed to bring "legal peace" to Austria.

Before these developments, Austria claimed that it, too, had been a victim of Nazi oppression.

To be eligible for payments, claimants must show, under relaxed standards of evidence, the following:

- ownership of property at time of confiscation, Aryanization and liquidation.
- proof that the claim was never decided under previous restitution legislation.

Claimants must also show that previous claims were denied because they had no access to evidence.

Spadinger said that claimants may contact the Austrian embassy and Austrian consulates throughout Canada for further infomation.

Austria has consulates in Toronto, Montreal, Calgary, Halifax, Regina, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Canadians show solidarity for Israel in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Dean Bye and 80 fellow Christian supporters of Israel boarded an El Al flight to Israel this week, they were embarking on a "tour" of the Holy Land, most definitely not a "mission."

"Mission" is a word often used to describe organized Jewish trips to Israel, but Bye believes it can have another, loaded meaning.

"So often that word can be offensive to the Jewish people," Bye explained. "We don't want to be mistaken for proselytizers."

Unlike missionaries who seek to convert Jews to Christianity, Bye and his fellow visitors intend to "bring a blessing for the new olim" of Israel and a blessing for the Jewish state.

Bye is executive director of the Canadian branch of Christians for Israel, a non-denominational organization whose goal is to educate Christians about the church's fractured historical relationship with Jews and to support Israel.

"We want to stand in solidarity with Israel; we want them to know there are Canadian Christians who pray for them and who stand with them," Bye said.

The group's visit to the Holy Land coincided with a surge of tours in recent weeks that are bringing more and more visitors to the besieged Jewish state.

Christians for Israel shared space on their flight with 30 supporters of Bridges for Peace, an organization dedicated to improving relationships among Christians, Jews and Israel, as well as with 155 Jews from across Canada travelling on a solidarity mission.

Around the same time, about 850 participants flew to Israel as part of the Birthright Israel campaign, adding their numbers to a 500-strong contingent that visited in January. A further 1,000 young people between 18 and 26 are expected to depart for Israel in June, bringing the 2001 total to 1,350, said Elizabeth Sokolsky, national director of Birthright Israel.

The increasing number of visitors flying to Israel is giving Rami Fischer some reason for optimism. Fischer is the general manager of El Al Canada who had the misfortune to assume his new post around the same time the recent intifadah broke out.

Total traffic to Israel on El Al dropped 60 to 70 percent beginning in October, Fischer said, and El Al responded with dramatic cuts in airfare, offering $999 and then $959 return fares to Tel Aviv.

According to Rebecca Gluck, public relations and marketing manger of the Israel Government Tourism Office, travel to Israel had increased 25 percent in the first nine months of 2000, prior to the onset of the intifadah.

TV images of violence have scared away many potential visitors, Fischer said, but he is hopeful the airline has turned the corner and will see more and more Canadians visit.

Rev. John Howson is doing all he can to accommodate Fischer. Rev. Howson, a representative of Bridges for Peace, is bringing 30 Canadians to Israel this week, while two weeks before, he led a group of 24 pastors on a familiarization tour of the Holy Land.

Rev. Howson, who splits his time between his home in Winnipeg and his office in Jerusalem, makes two or three trips a year to Israel, accompanied by other pastors, lay persons and students. A group of 30 students from Grand Rapids, Mich., is scheduled to visit in May, he said.

Rev. Howson acknowledges that images of violence have deterred some from visiting Israel, but during his most recent visit, "we never saw one problem, and we were in many places. We walked all through the Old City, all through the Muslim quarter by foot, and we never had a ripple."

Rev. Howson said the groups he leads "go to stand in solidarity with the people of Israel."

During his last visit, "we were able to encourage the Israeli people whenever we met."

Following his visit to Israel, Rev. Howson plans to travel to Poland, Ukraine and Slovakia where his organization is active in encouraging and assisting impoverished Jews in small town to move to Israel. They sponsor an "exobus" which ferries the olim to larger centres where they board El Al flights to Israel, he said.

Christians for Israel, which also supports efforts "to bring Jews home," will present Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert with thousands of signed petitions "that agree with his declaration for one Jerusalem, along with a gift of maple syrup," Bye said.

Meanwhile, 155 Jews from Vancouver to Montreal will visit Israel on a whirlwind four-day mission, said Howard English, director of marketing and communications for UJA FEDERATION in Toronto.

They will range from Metulla in the north to the embattled Jerusalem suburb of Gilo to Kiryat Moshe, a suburb of Rehovot that claims the largest concentration of Ethiopian Jews in Israel. UJA FEDERATION has partnered with the Israeli town to provide financial and human resource assistance to aid in the integration of the Ethiopians to life in Israel.

Since the intifadah began, five missions of 40 to 50 people have visited Israel. The current contingent is by far the largest.

Surging CHAT Enrolment - It's Elementary

CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) has become such a popular choice that parents with children in elementary school are already making registration inquiries for the future. "Recently, I had a long phone call with a mother whose kids are in grade six," says CHAT headmaster Paul Shaviv. "We are seeing interest expressed earlier and earlier."

Shaviv attributes CHAT's tremendous growth - around 1200 students are enrolled this year - to the school's superior educational standards and its open environment.

"Interestingly, denominational differences are becoming less important to many Jewish families," says Shaviv. "Parents value the Jewish community unity ideal."

CHAT's massive growth over the last five years has brought many changes to the school community. In addition to last year's $8.5 million renovation, which created the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre, in partnership with UJA FEDERATION's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, CHAT also established a new Richmond Hill branch last September. CHAT Richmond Hill is now home to 178 grade nine students.

According to Gary Levine, Vice-Principal of the Richmond Hill branch, the new campus is off to a roaring start. "We're pleased," says Levine. "We're getting very positive feedback from the overwhelming majority of students, and the parents have been very supportive as well."

Levine says that while the greatest challenges have been growth management and attempting to "inject the ethos of CHAT" into the new branch, Richmond Hill has offered the students a unique leadership opportunity. "It's a rare thing when grade nines, often termed, 'freshmen,' get to run their own school," says Levine. "It's an experience that grade nines don't get anywhere but in CHAT."

"The new school is also blessed with an outstanding staff that has made certain the two campuses reflect parallel programs and values," adds Shaviv.

CHAT is directing its efforts, as well, towards the hope of building a new school on UJA FEDERATION's York Region Jewish Community Campus at Bathurst and Weldrick. "We may be big now," says Shaviv, "but in five years' time CHAT could be educating 1700 or 1800 students on two campuses. We have to be ready for that."

President Praises Visionary Partners

Baila Lubek, who recently finished a two year term as CHAT Board President, credits CHAT's success to parents, staff and students for their willingness to "take chances for the education offered to children in our Jewish community."

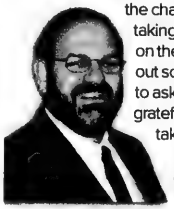
"It's been a wonderful volunteer opportunity," says Lubek. "My children grew up at CHAT, and it's been a pleasure to give back to the school."

Lubek is proud of CHAT's reputation as a top-notch educational facility and the school's comfortable, Jewish atmosphere that nurtures each individual student. "CHAT," says Lubek, "is a special place where children are looked after and cared for."

Lubek says that while the road to change has sometimes been bumpy, risks taken by the entire school community have generated enormous returns. "Last June, we had a difficult choice to make as to how to best manage growth. We had to alter landscapes regarding our collective vision of the future," says Lubek.

Baila Lubek

However, she adds, when the time came to make decisions guaranteeing the school's future, the entire CHAT community rose to the challenge. "Risk-taking always comes with difficulties. But on the whole, Richmond Hill has worked out so extraordinarily well, you just need to ask the students. And we're really grateful to the parents who were willing to take the chance."



Brian Lass

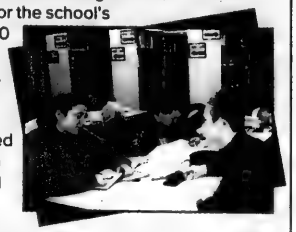
Lubek points out that changes at CHAT aren't merely limited to building. "We are very fortunate to be blessed with a professional team so capable of offering such an excellent education, both Jewish and secular."

Lubek has been succeeded by Brian Lass. "The biggest challenges I face as incoming President are bringing the Richmond Hill branch online as a full school," says Lass, "and putting all the factors in place for our new facility in York Region. I am very excited about serving as President during such exciting times."

Calling all Alumni...

CHAT is set to kick off its Alumni Capital Campaign to raise $1.8 million for the Wilmington campus library.

Michael Goldrich, a 1975 CHAT graduate who is co-chairing the Alumni Campaign with Dan Shimmerman, acknowledges that $1.8 million is a lofty goal for the school's roughly 3000 member alumni base. The campaign has already raised $600,000 in pledges and the large majority of alumni have not yet been contacted for their gift.



The new library, with 41 computers connected to the Internet, opened in September 1999. According to head librarian Shirley Markman, the new facility is a magnet for students.

"Before we opened," Markman explains, "the library was not a place kids wanted to be. Mostly, we were empty. Now we are constantly full of students. Sometimes we're so busy that I have to stand at the door and say, 'I'm sorry, the library's full right now.'"

"Of course," says Goldrich, "the dollars for the new library are urgently needed. However, we see the Alumni campaign as serving two additional purposes. First, unlike other schools, CHAT hasn't really had an active alumni team that could be mobilized in times of need. So this campaign is going to give alumni the chance to work together. Additionally, since many of these alumni currently have kids in CHAT, it is a chance for them to give back to the school that gave them so much."

Champion CHAT Team

The CHAT varsity hockey team went undefeated at the Can-Am Challenge Cup tournament November 30 to December 3 in Lake Placid, NY. "We won the gold medal which was amazing," said team coach Adam Chaim. "But what made me proudest was that we also won the fair play award for best sportsmanship. This really is a great, great group of guys."

CHAT lines is sponsored and produced by The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto.

Democracy's true sovereign, the people

Less than two years after he became prime minister of Israel, Ehud Barak lost the confidence of the majority of the very same people who had elected him. Ariel Sharon, the veteran soldier, farmer, politician, legislator defeated Barak by a margin of almost 2 votes to 1.

The votes had barely been counted, however, when some pundits, in North America and abroad, were already attempting to delegitimize the election results and to demonize the prime minister-elect. It was the lowest election turnout in Israeli history, they pointed out, conveniently forgetting that the 60 percent figure was still higher than most turnouts for presidential elections in the United States. And oh how they moaned for the future of the peace process now that the "hard-liner with blood on his hands" had been elected, conveniently forgetting the events of the past four months since the outbreak of the recent violence in Israel and the territories, or the past seven years since the Oslo accord was signed, or even the past 52 years since the State of Israel was created.

No one who truly yearns for peace between Israel and its neighbours and who cherishes the rule of democracy can brook these disingenuous, mischievous efforts to discount or disparage the results of the election. Democracy's only true sovereign, the people, have spoken.

Leading up to the election, Israelis had absorbed two enormous shocks to their collective national psyche and sense of security: the extent of Ehud Barak's willingness to compromise, and conversely, the extent of Yasser Arafat's lack of willingness to compromise.

These shocks, of course, were felt most profoundly by the large bloc of Israelis who, for the most part, try to live their lives in the moderate middle of Israeli life, neither hard-core ideologues nor "extremists."

Barak's unreciprocated "generosity" was considered naive by some, offensive by others and downright dangerous by even more.

But Arafat's abject rejection of Barak's mounting magnanimity was eye-opening. He spurned Barak with a contemptuous, cynical resort to the only "diplomacy" he knows: prevarication and violence. In doing so, his mask fell. Israelis saw Arafat's true face, and in it, a man and a leadership bereft of any understanding of or respect for democracy. He needed to gain their trust; but he spurned them as well, lying constantly to them even as he has to the entire Western world.

With his current attempts to cobble together a unity government, Prime Minister-elect Sharon shows his determination to hold on to the centre, the moderate middle of Israelis. He well understands that to venture forward toward peace, securing their support is the first step.

We wish him Godspeed in this effort.

So too should all democracy and peace loving peoples.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Re: Elliott Malamet's "Snow and blood: the flow of prejudice" (CJN, Jan. 18). The author suggests that a more disturbing facet of being targeted by Orthodox snowball-throwers was the foreignness he represented to them, raising the issue of prejudice towards the Jew that is the "other." The author goes on to say that "the right wing world has a commodity that is often lacking elsewhere: passion." I feel that this statement is inaccurate. Passion for truth, for righteous causes, for friends, lovers, families and God abound in conservative and more liberal communities as in the Orthodox community.

Prejudice seems invariably linked to attitudes towards those who are not the bearers of their own prized truths. Right-wing prejudice is disconcerting, and yet equally disturbing is the unlimited, though perhaps no less prejudiced openness that liberalism has rendered, as described in the context of the author's CHAT students. As a CHAT alumna, I agree with him about the troubling nature of each type of discrimination, and I would "passionately" suggest that in essence, our tradition calls for a holier conception of relations ben adam l'chavero.

As the French philosopher Emmanuel Levinas proposed, Jewish spirituality and openness to the world should not simply co-exist in isolation; they should actually revitalize one another. He suggested that a sincere openness to the world guarantees a revival of Jewish spirituality while a true revival of Jewish spirituality demands openness to the world. It is perhaps this approach that will command respect for the truth of the "other" and diffuse the flow of prejudice towards Jew and non-Jew alike.

Correcting a Glitch-enstein

In his article "Of Berliners, Oppenheimers and Rothschilds" (CJN, Feb. 1), Ze'ev Glicenstein mistakenly includes Berlin, Gershwin and Rogers as part of the German-Jewish immigrant stock. Irving Berlin was born in Siberia, George Gershwin is the son of Russian immigrants and Richard Rodgers (not "Rogers") was originally Rodginsky.

No pardon for Pollard – 1

Mr. Ian Belfer asks a good question when he ponders how former president Bill Clinton managed to pardon over 140 people and failed to do so for John Pollard, who languishes in a federal prison. (CJN, Feb. 1, Letters to the Editor)

Author John Loftus, in his national bestseller The Secret War Against the Jews, provides a detailed account of the Pollard affair from the viewpoint of retired U.S. and international espionage agents.

These ex-agents claim that Pollard was not, in fact, an agent of the Mossad, but that he was acting for a group of right-wing Israeli politicians. Pollard embarrassed Israel and especially the Mossad by his activities and capture, and he remains a constant embarrassment to Israel to this day. Loftus goes so far as to say that Israel hates Pollard and this is why he remains in prison.

I would ask a different question. Don't you think that if Israel had demanded Pollard's pardon in return for its continued co-operation in the Clinton-led peace process, Pollard would have been freed?

No pardon for Pollard – 2

On his last day in office, with nothing to lose politically, former president Bill Clinton refused clemency to Pollard, but granted it to 140 others whose offences included murder, robbery and drug dealing. Two of the clemencies granted, one to Marc Rich, a tax fraud racketeer and fugitive, and the other to Susan Rosenberg, an urban terrorist, have prompted outrage and elicited calls for a congressional investigation.

Despite all of these major developments, the vast majority of Jewish leaders and the Jewish press have been silent. Ian Belfer is quite right to ask, "What is going on?"

Darchei Noam and Out of the Cold

I commend your coverage of the plight of the homeless (CJN, Jan. 25, "Out of the Cold Affirms Dignity of Homeless"), but I wish to draw your attention to an error in the article. The reporter states that Holy Blossom was "the first Jewish congregation to participate in Out of the Cold, in 1996. Congregation Darchei Noam has been involved in the First Interfaith Out of the Cold program with St. Peter's Church since 1995.

On Thursday nights, we host up to 125 guests for dinner and up to 80 sleep overnight, stay until breakfast and leave with a packaged lunch. Over 65 Darchei Noam members and friends, including a number of children and teens volunteer in the program. Our program is in the centre of the downtown area where the need is great.

Working together with a church group allows us the opportunity to educate each other about our religions and traditions as we did at a recent Shabbat service honouring the volunteers from both programs. In addition to filling a dire social need, this programme has provided an enriching experience for all involved.

'Israelis should not dash for air-raid shelters'

By YOEL MARCUS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Ariel Sharon's landslide victory should not necessarily make Israelis dash for their air-raid shelters.

Unlike some past electoral victors who, in their first public appearance in the role of prime minister, were so full of themselves, so haughty, so anxious to start a fight and to "settle accounts" with old rivals, what Israelis saw on after the victory announcement was a restrained, modest and cautious individual. So cautious, in fact, that, in the view of many observers, Sharon's first public appearance as prime minister-elect indicated that he was actually frightened by his victory and by the responsibility that had suddenly been thrust on his shoulders.

That, however, would be a misinterpretation. Instead of sarcasm and sabre-rattling, Sharon conveyed a message of restraint. He talked about true peace, about painful compromises for both Palestinians and Israelis, and about the opening of a new chapter in Israel's relationship with its Arab citizens. He also called on the Palestinians to resume their dialogue with Israel and he spoke in favour of pursuing a solution to the Middle East dispute through negotiations.

Israeli Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon receives a bouquet of flowers from supporters as he arrives at Likud party headquarters in Tel Aviv on Feb. 8. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Yet what was included in Sharon's speech is not as important as what was excluded. He made no mention of expanding Jewish settlements or creating new ones. Nor did he rule out an independent Palestinian state. Of course, not one word was said about the vision of the Greater Land of Israel. What stood out the most was Sharon's strong desire for a national unity government together with Labour.

All this does not mean that this old lion has become a pussycat overnight or that he wants a national unity government in order to clear his name and become "legitimate" again. Sharon simply wants to succeed. And the fact that the climate is deteriorating to the point of another war does not neatly dovetail with his promise of peace.

Sharon's interests are, thus, essentially political. He needs national unity in order to prevent the return to the party leadership of Benjamin Netanyahu, who, in Sharon's book, corrupted Israel's government. He also needs national unity to thwart the danger of early elections within another few months.

But more than anything else, he needs national unity to avoid the prospect of becoming a hostage in a narrow-based coalition in which small-time politicians would wield a lot of power, and extremists, even according to Sharon's own criteria, could drag Israel into a full-fledged confrontation with the Palestinians.

The experts in the Israel Defence Forces believe that the level of violence in 2001 will be roughly equivalent to what it has been for the past 130 days. Fatah is in no hurry to lay down its arms. In the absence of a peace treaty or even interim agreements, there is a real danger that the Palestinian Authority's regime could collapse – a development that would certainly not be in Israel's interests and would be a thorn in the side of the new Bush administration in Washington.

Therefore, Sharon will have to quickly enter into a dialogue with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat and attach great importance to conducting these talks on the basis of a "broad national consensus" in Israel – that is, peace talks by representatives of a national unity government.

Sharon hoped to form a national unity government with outgoing prime minister Ehud Barak. However, Barak's amazingly disastrous defeat in Tuesday's election means that Sharon will have to work with a very confused Labour Party that is in a state of chaos and on the verge of being plunged into an insane succession battle.

There are reasonable grounds for assuming that Labour will hold primaries and that, until those primaries decide who will be party leader (Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg, Interior Minister Haim Ramon, Communications Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer or Foreign Minister and Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami), the world will not simply come to a standstill.

It is in the national interest that Labour do everything possible in order to accept Sharon's proposal to join a national unity government. Everything must be done to prevent a right/ist-haredi cabinet from ruling the country for even one day, because the measures that would be taken by such a government would have tragic consequences that would be felt for generations to come.

A national unity cabinet is essentially an ad hoc measure for the implementation of tasks that can only be carried out by a broad-based government. Such a cabinet is vital, for example, for the amendment of the system for the direct election of the prime minister – a system that has thrown a monkey wrench into the gears of properly functioning government in Israel.

A national unity government is also vital for dealing with social and economic issues, for reducing the extortion capacity of the haredi parties and, especially, for leaving the extremists out of the cabinet.

A broad-based cabinet would give Arafat some more time to carefully consider what he really wants. If Barak erred in trying to press for an immediate final status agreement, perhaps the multi-staged approach that is being adopted by Sharon – who aspires to be prime minister in a government representing the majority of Israelis – might be more palatable for Arafat.

This writer was firmly opposed to the idea that former prime minister and Regional Cooperation Minister Shimon Peres replace Barak as Labour's candidate in Tuesday's prime ministerial election. However, a new set of circumstances is in place today. Sharon has promised to bring peace, but he will never be able to keep that promise or be able to bring security or any other benefit to Israel, for that matter, if he has Yisrael Beitenu MKs Rehavam "Gandhi" Ze'evi and Avigdor Lieberman sitting on his tail.

Until the in-fighting ends in Labour, it can certainly choose Peres to serve as party leader and as its number-one representative in a national unity government.

Peres, 77, and Sharon, 73, must have something going for them if they have managed to survive in the public arena since Israel became independent in 1948 and are still alive and kicking.

These are two old foxes who cannot be accused of naiveté – and each has 50 years of doing really important things under their belt. Let's give these two old guys a chance to try their luck working in unison. In view of the meteoric careers of Bibi and Barak, and in view of the trail of failures they have left behind, it would be a good idea to let Israel's young, brilliant politicians cool their heels for a while.

Ariel Sharon: His life in brief

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

- Born on September 27, 1928, in Kfar Malal, as Ariel Scheinerman.
- Registered profession: farmer.
- Lives in a Negev ranch known as Havat Hashikmim. Also owns a house in the Muslim Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City.
- Sharon is a widower and father of three sons, Omri and Gilad and Gur, who was killed in a shooting accident at age 11. His first wife, Margalit, was killed in a car accident.
- His second wife, Lily, died last year.
- Speaks Hebrew and English.
- Majored in history and Middle Eastern studies at Hebrew University in Jerusalem (1953).
- Holds a law degree from Tel Aviv University (1958-1962).
- Joined the Haganah in 1945 and served in the Jewish settlements' guard force.
- During the War of Independence, Sharon was a platoon commander in the Alexandroni Brigade.
- Was wounded in the battle for Latrun.
- Promoted to company commander in 1949. In 1951, became an intelligence officer.
- In 1952, while in school, Sharon was placed at the head of Unit 101, established to carry out retaliatory raids against the fedayeen (Arab terrorist squads that mounted cross-border attacks into Israel).
- In 1954, Sharon commanded a retaliatory raid on the village of Kibya, in the course of which civilian homes were bombed with their inhabitants still inside.
- In 1956, appointed head of the Paratroopers Brigade. Fought in the Sinai Campaign.
- Promoted to major-general in 1966 and made head of the Israel Defence Forces' Training Department.
- Commanded an armoured division during the 1967 Six-Day War.
- In 1969, appointed head of the Southern Command. Worked to fortify the Bar-Lev Line along the Suez Canal.
- Resigned from the IDF in 1973 to run for Knesset.
- When the Yom Kippur War broke out in 1973, he was recalled to service as commander of an armoured division. He led the IDF's crossing of the Suez Canal while in open conflict with his superior officers.
- First elected to the Knesset in 1974.
- Was a Likud MK in the Eighth Knesset, but resigned after one year.
- From June 1975 to March 1976 served as special advisor to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.
- In advance of elections to the Ninth Knesset, he established his own party, Shlomzion, and won two seats. Shlomzion later merged with Herut as part of the Likud.
- Served as a Likud MK from the Ninth Knesset to the Thirteenth Knesset.
- In Menachem Begin's first government, Sharon was given the agriculture portfolio and chaired the ministerial committee for settlement affairs. In this capacity, he oversaw the establishment of new Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.
- Became minister of defence in the Tenth Knesset.
- On September 16, 1982, during the war in Lebanon, Operation Peace for the Galilee, the day after Lebanese President Bashir Jemayel was assassinated, Sharon allowed the Christian Phalangists to enter the refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila to search for terrorists. The resulting massacre led to the establishment of state commission of inquiry headed by Supreme Court President Yitzhak Kahan. The commission found that Sharon did not do enough to prevent the killings carried out in the camps by the Christian militiamen. He was forced to resign as defence minister. He was subsequently appointed minister without a portfolio.
- A New York court ruled in favour of Sharon in a libel suit he had brought against Time magazine for claiming that he had encouraged the Jemayel family to take revenge on the Palestinians.
- In April 1982, Sharon led the IDF operation evacuating Pitchat Rafiah in the Sinai, scheduled to be handed over to Egypt, including the dismantling of Yamit.
- In the Twelfth Knesset, Sharon served as minister of industry and trade, and later as minister of construction and housing.
- Sharon was given the newly created national infrastructure portfolio by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the Fourteenth Knesset. Following David Levy's resignation, Sharon became foreign minister.
- After Netanyahu's defeat in the 1999 elections, Sharon was elected Likud chairman, over Ehud Olmert and Meir Sheetrit.
- Served as MK for the Likud and opposition chairman in the Fifteenth Knesset.
- In December 2001, became the Likud's candidate for prime minister.

The biggest names of the year

On the last day of the year 2000, my eye fell on a one-column article by Thomas Vinciguerra in the New York Times.

The article dealt with the names that people had given to children who were born in the United States in the year 2000. I suspect that in this regard, the result would not be greatly different for Canada, for the trends are continental rather than national. Of course, children born in Quebec would make a difference, and thus French names have to be excepted from the discussion.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Vinciguerra presents us with the most popular names that children received during the year. Eleven thousand respondents participated in the survey, conducted by the Web site www.babycenter.com. To no one's suprise, and following a long tradition, biblical names continue to predominate.

The most popular name for boys was Michael (Hebrew meaning: who is like God) and for girls, Hannah (in Hebrew: related to grace or mercy). Among the other top names for boys were Jacob, Joseph, Zachary and Joshua. For girls, Sarah and Elizabeth (Elisheva) were among the runners-up.

Vinciguerra asks, "Whatever happened to James, Richard, Mary and Jane? They are listed as numbers 20, 68, 81 and beyond 100, respectively."

A quote taken from the Encyclopedia of Bad Taste (Harper Collins, 1990) says, "In the late '70s and early '80s, white babies had a good chance of getting a Celtic or French name that satisfied their parents' craving to sound sophisticated."

And who really is aware what Michael means, or that Jacob was so called because he grabbed the heel of his twin brother?

To be sure, when people bestow names on their children, they are not necessarily aware just whence they come and which culture or tradition has brought them to public attention. In fact, popular trends are usually difficult to define and almost impossible to predict.

To me, in any case, the persistence of Hebrew/biblical names remains a remarkable fact of life, especially since even a minimum of knowledge of the Bible has seriously decreased in North American civilization. Still, its impact has deep roots in western civilization and Hebrew names are a recurring example. Perhaps some of my readers will have a more specific explanation than this, and I should be happy to hear from them.

Are Jews prominent among biblical name-givers? I hope so, but I am not sure of it. A few years ago, North American Jewish children were likely to get Irish or British names, a trend that has lately gone out of style and, I hope, will remain so.

Campaign '01: Much ado about nothing

Have I have been asleep on the job for the past two months? Did I take leave of my faculties since winter set in? How else to explain that although Israel was in the throes of an election campaign since December, I barely heard or read any in-depth discussion of the most serious issues facing the country? Maybe I was out to lunch.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Methinks not. Due to both my professional obligations and personal interest, I followed closely Ehud Barak and Ariel Sharon's efforts to court favour with the electorate. Both failed to inspire the masses. The lacklustre campaign betrayed a strange sense of apathy if not disillusionment and confusion on the part of voters who saw the election more as a cynical imposition by politicians than democracy in action.

Something was different this time, even if the consequences of the vote were no less important than in previous elections.

Barak and Sharon were locked in a race that focused almost exclusively on peace, security and their respective personalities. Beyond that, neither saw fit to outline a program of domestic priorities.

Now that the contest is over, it's anyone's guess how Sharon intends to actually rule this ungovernable country. No one seems to know. Through no fault of its own, the public went to the polls with little clue on where both candidates stood on most major concerns.

Naturally, there were nifty jingles, slogans galore and endless obligatory rhetoric about peace and security, of which both Barak and Sharon presented themselves as fearless champions. How could they not? Each, of course, also promised unproven solutions to the quagmire with the Palestinians. All very important stuff, to be sure, but why at the exclusion of virtually everything else?

If an election campaign is supposed to reflect the state of the nation based on a well-rounded airing of the problems and challenges facing the society, heaven help us. From the candidates' TV spots to their public speeches and interviews with the press, it should all add up to an engaging mix of fresh ideas and policy commitments. It didn't.

By Israeli standards, the two-month campaign was short and low-key. It was especially short on discussion of the country's many ailments. For all the political rhetoric and blanket coverage in the media, the campaign was most remarkable for what Barak and Sharon did not say.

Their reticence over what policies they advocate on the domestic front was deafening. No doubt yielding to their handlers and spin mavens, our usually loquacious candidates had nary a word on how they would tackle all kinds of unpleasant but crucial matters bedeviling the everyday life of voters.

Forget about the bevy of critical problems plaguing Israel's present and future. Forget about worrisome developments in health care, the economy, education, transportation and the environment; forget about the water crisis; forget about the growing secular-religious divide; forget about badly needed electoral reform; forget about minority rights.

Hard to believe that in a country so rife with such pressing issues that Barak and Sharon could so diligently avoid any subject other than that of peace and security. Not that they had a tough time of it. Apart from focusing on the horse-race factor, the media mirrored the candidates' obsessive concentration on the diplomatic process.

It's not surprising, given the largely superficial, personality-driven coverage of the campaign, that some analysts contend that Israeli journalists abdicated their role in the democratic process.

Perhaps the defining feature of modern electioneering is the paucity of time and space devoted to serious grappling with the issues. Image and perception seem to count for everything. Advisors rule the day, enveloping candidates in a public relations fog that leaves vital questions woefully neglected.

Candidates guard their opinions, campaign managers carefully package information and any public debate that ensues is largely confined to the surface through a constant flow of hackneyed clichés.

Yet, for all its glaring imperfections, there is some consolation in Israel's system of democracy and free elections. It's a lot better than what exists in the rest of the Middle East and in many other countries around the world.

Readers can contact Robert Sarner at rsarner@netvision.net.il.

Israel's day of rage

Media reports to the contrary, Palestinians do not have a monopoly on rage. It took Israelis longer to become angry, but they also reached the boiling point. However, here the resemblance ends.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

While the Palestinian officials orchestrate their "days of rage" and encourage attacks by the local youth in each city and village, (largely for the benefit of journalists, and with the hope that some will be injured or killed), Israeli anger has been channeled through the democratic process.

From the resumption of the Palestinian war against Israel on the day before Rosh Hashanah (Sept. 29), dozens of Israelis have been ambushed and murdered. In voting overwhelmingly for Sharon (or against Barak), the Israeli public demonstrated that it had enough of suffering in silence while waiting for a peace agreement that may never come.

Barak's government failed to fulfil the first requirement of any national leader: to protect the citizens of the state. Reflecting the primary interest and naïve hope that it was possible to reach an agreement with Arafat, Barak blocked or watered down many of the military's plans to disarm the Palestinian militias. In the end, Barak achieved neither peace nor security.

In a wider sense, these elections were the long-promised referendum on the Oslo "peace process." For seven years, the majority of Israelis have accepted major risks and made unprecedented concessions in the hope that these would be matched, at least in part, by the Palestinians. Yasser Arafat was reclassified from terrorist to statesman, and invited to set up what amounts to an independent state in Gaza and significant parts of the Judea and Samaria regions of the West Bank. He was allowed to form a police force that became an army, equipped with weapons smuggled by land, sea, and air. In return, Israelis received nothing but continued hatred and terrorism.

As a result, the election campaign was not about the personalities of Barak and Sharon, but only about the Oslo process. Efforts by the Barak campaign to shift the focus to Sharon's responsibility for the mistakes of the 1982 Lebanon War were irrelevant. Similarly, although Sharon's campaign slogans, claiming that he would bring a "real peace," had no credibility (most Israelis recognize that peace, in any form, will not come during the Arafat era), this was also inconsequential.

By voting for Ariel Sharon, Israeli voters sent a powerful message to the Bush administration in Washington, and to Ottawa, London, Paris and other centres of democracy and freedom around the world. What was mistakenly known as the Middle East "peace process" was, in fact, a naïve and ill-conceived "war process." The farce went on far too long, for many years after it became clear that in return for land, the Palestinians were only ready to offer terror. Israel has finally had enough.

Ariel Sharon must now develop the broad-based government of national unity that he has pursued since the Palestinian war began four months ago. On this basis, the first post-Oslo government must end the terrorism, reinforce Israeli deterrence, and restore Israel's public image. The illusion of the peace process gave polished and well-rehearsed Palestinian and Arab propagandists years of unopposed domination of the media. In the Peres-Beilin-Barak view of the world, since peace was around the corner, there was no need to refute Arab efforts to rewrite history. As a result, the myths of Palestinian "right of return," exclusivist Islamic claims in Jerusalem, and the "sanctity" of the non-existent 1948 borders are widely seen as historical fact, and corrections will take many years of hard work.

In other words, Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon is taking office under very difficult circumstances, with plenty of dangers ahead. In 1973, during the darkest days of the Yom Kippur War, Sharon took command of the exhausted Israeli forces in the Sinai, and led them back, across the canal, to the outskirts of Cairo, thereby turning defeat into victory. His challenges today are very similar.

The Kirshner File

Can Ariel Sharon bring peace to Israel?

Sheldon Kirshner is Toronto

The pendulum in Israeli politics has swung again, ushering in a new uncertain era in the Middle East. Israelis, for the fourth time in nine years, have rejected an incumbent prime minister in an election.

In 1992, they discarded Yitzhak Shamir and elected Yitzhak Rabin. In 1996, Rabin's successor, Shimon Peres, went down to defeat at the hands of Benjamin Netanyahu. In 1999, Ehud Barak steamrolled over Netanyahu. And now, in a triumph of unprecedented scale, Ariel Sharon has crushed Barak.

The overarching issue in all four elections was identical – the peace process. Shamir was ousted because he was regarded as too rigidly ideological in his approach to a settlement. Peres lost because his conception of a "new Middle East" crashed up against the ugly realities of an Islamic fundamentalist suicide bombing blitz. Netanyahu, his grating personality notwithstanding, was thrown out because his policies virtually gutted the peace process and thereby damaged Israel's relations with friends and neighbours alike.

Barak, having inherited Rabin's mantle as Mr. Security, forfeited last week's election, after only 19 months in office, because of the deep sense of disappointment and disillusionment with his conciliatory policies. In essence, Barak was defeated because he was ahead of his time. He dared to grapple with thorny permanent status issues. He outlined what could be the parameters of a final agreement.

Barak's concessions to Syria and the Palestinians, which went unreciprocated, were considered too sweeping by the vast majority of Israeli Jews. Although desirous of peace, they were simply unprepared for the painful compromises that serious negotiations demand. More important still, the uprising launched by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in the wake of the collapsed Camp David summit last July convinced middle-of-the-road swing voters – centrist Israelis who effectively decide the outcome of elections – that Barak could not guarantee their personal security.

In the four months since the eruption of the intifadah, more than 50 Israelis have been killed in a spate of shootings and bombings that far exceed the Jewish death rate during the first Palestinian uprising from 1987 to 1993. Most of the killings have taken place in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, much of which Barak was theoretically willing to relinquish in the interests of achieving a lasting accord with the Palestinians.

The fear, anxiety and anger that these attacks engendered prompted some Israelis, particularly new Russian immigrants who make up 19 percent of the electorate, to conclude that Barak was unfit to lead the nation, and that the current Palestinian leadership was basically untrustworthy and unreliable.

Barak's downfall can also be ascribed to the deep alienation of Israeli Arabs, who all but boycotted the election. A minority comprising 12 percent of the electorate and almost 20 percent of Israel's population, they felt utterly betrayed by Barak.

In the immediate aftermath of his 1999 victory, he did not bother to consult their political leaders as he jockeyed to form a coalition government. To add insult to injury, he did not appoint a single Arab cabinet minister. During the first days of the Palestinian uprising, Israeli police fired on unarmed Israeli Arab demonstrators, killing 13. Months later, Barak expressed "deep sorrow" for their deaths, but Arabs dismissed his virtual apology as crass electioneering. In a bid to curry favour with Israeli Arabs, he announced a $1-billion plan to improve long-neglected services in the Arab sector. But this, too, was perceived as a cheap vote-getting ploy.

In the waning days of the campaign, when public opinion polls showed Sharon with a commanding lead, Barak described the election in the starkest possible terms, a choice between a chance for peace and the risk of a Middle East war. Driving home his point, Barak called Sharon an "extremist without restraints." But the people were not listening. A poll conducted by the Israel Democracy Institute indicated that only one-fifth of Israelis believed that real peace was attainable. The comparable figure in 1999 was 67 percent.

What had dampened their faith in the possibilities of peace?

The dismissive Palestinian response to Barak's Camp David overtures – the most generous ever offered by an Israeli prime minister – and to Bill Clinton's subsequent bridging proposals disillusioned Israelis. (In all fairness, the Palestinians believed that both plans fell considerably short of acceptability). The Palestinian insistence on the "right of return" of Arab refugees to their former homes in Israel was viewed as a backhanded prescription for Israel's destruction. The outbreak of Palestinian violence was a blatant violation of the Oslo accords. The constant reminders by certain Palestinian leaders that the intifadah would rage on until Palestinian goals were met jolted Israelis.

These factors, all related to Israel's political and military struggle with the Palestinians, largely explain Sharon's smashing success in the Feb. 6 election, which Barak repeatedly called a referendum about peace.

Sharon, in his post-election speeches, promised to usher in "a new era of security" and to achieve "true peace." And in line with his newly buffed image as a moderate, he declared, "I know peace requires difficult compromises – from both sides."

But is Sharon, a hardliner who has opposed each and every peace treaty with Israel's Arab neighbours, really ready for it? Is he capable of being a Charles de Gaulle (who ended France's colonial occupation of Algeria), or a Richard Nixon (whose rapprochement with China changed the balance of power in Asia)?

The initial signals that he and his advisors have emitted are hardly encouraging.

On the eve of the election, Zalman Shoval, a Likud stalwart close to Sharon, urged the Palestinians to lower their expectations, saying that they are "unrealistic." Sharon, for his part, has denounced the Oslo framework, claiming it has been rendered meaningless by Palestinian violations. Needless to say, Sharon has not referred to Israeli breaches, such as the failure to implement the third withdrawal from the West Bank.

Sharon seeks non-belligerency agreements of an interim nature with Arafat. The Palestinians want a comprehensive agreement in which all issues are settled.

Sharon is opposed to turning over any further territory to the Palestinian Authority. At present, the Palestinians are in full or partial control of an archipelago of 42 percent of the West Bank and about two-thirds of Gaza. Barak offered upwards of 95 percent of the West Bank and the whole of Gaza. Logic dictates that Arafat will not accept a less favourable offer.

Though Sharon has belatedly signed on to the idea of a Palestinian state, his concept of such a state, composed of bits and pieces of disconnected territory bisected by bypass roads, Jewish settlements and army camps, is totally at odds with that of the Palestinians. They will doubtless sneer at a so-called toy state.

Sharon, whose goal is to carve out security zones around Jerusalem and in the Jordan Valley, wants all settlements to remain in place, even isolated ones. If, however, he goes ahead with his scheme for unilateral separation from the Palestinians, he will have to uproot at least some settlements, whose security value, in any event, is highly questionable.

Unlike Barak, Sharon does not wish to share Jerusalem, not to mention the Temple Mount. Nor will he give up the Golan Heights in exchange for peace with Syria. The one and only position he holds that is completely consistent with Israel's national consensus is his refusal to budge on the right of return.

A jaunty Ariel Sharon exudes confidence in the waning days of the election campaign.

Sharon's reluctance to deal with Arafat directly, much less shake his hand, also poses a problem. In a recent interview, Sharon branded Arafat as a "liar and murderer."

Sharon's hawkish views inspire trepidation in Israel and the Arab world, but he will be ultimately judged by his deeds, not his words. Certainly, he will have no alternative but to moderate his policies should the Labour

Golden says goodbye to Toronto United Way

New president, CEO of Conference Board of Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anne Golden is stepping down as president of the United Way of Greater Toronto with mixed feelings – sadness at leaving her professional home of almost 20 years and excitement at the prospect of taking over the helm of the Ottawa-based think tank, The Conference Board of Canada.

"I think it is the job of a lifetime," said Golden, 59, in a recent interview at the downtown headquarters of United Way, where she has served as president for the past 14 years, prior to which she headed both the campaign and allocations departments.

A historian by training with a PhD from the University of Toronto, Golden said her appointment as president and CEO of the Conference Board, in which she has participated as a committee member, takes her back to her public policy and research roots. "I've always loved research, analysis and ideas."

The prospect of working for a national organization and beyond the scope of the social sector also appeals to her, she said.

Among the laurels Golden has received for her work, she was the 1999 honoree at the Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner, one of the highest honours given by the Jewish community here.

Although she didn't plan to stay at United Way indefinitely, the opportunity in Ottawa arose a year or two before she'd planned to leave, she said. Despite her enthusiasm for the change, she finds it "extremely painful to leave a place that you love and people that you love and respect so much."

The new position, which becomes effective Sept. 30, will also entail lifestyle changes – Golden plans to commute between Toronto and Ottawa.

"I will always be back for Friday night," said the youthful grandmother of three, a skier and fitness buff whose credenza is topped by an array of family photos.

Her husband is supportive of her upcoming move. In fact, he was "absolutely convinced that this was right for me," Golden said.

Under her leadership, the United Way has consistently surpassed its fundraising goals (in 2000, the agency raised $70 million) and has expanded from 72 to 200 funded agencies.

Although advocacy has played a large part in her role as president of the United Way – and to a certain extent in her role as chair of Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman's Homelessness Action Task Force in 1998 – Golden said people should not expect that of her at the Conference Board, because the missions of the two organizations are different.

However, she noted, there are a number of analogies between United Way and the Conference Board.

"United Way is very well known, but it's not known well," said Golden. Similarly, she believes most people don't really know what the Conference Board does.

"I would describe the purpose [of the Conference Board] as promoting the best in leadership and management," she said, explaining that staffers conduct research on behalf of government, corporations and other customers; and connect people – colleagues from different companies, for example – so they can share ideas.

The United Way, also, connects people, she noted, specifying the "common cause of caring for the purpose of community."

Golden has expressed more than once her belief that there are "two things about any endeavour that are important: first, that the job be worth doing, and, second, that the people be worth doing it with.

"I certainly had that at United Way, but I also believe I have found that again at the Conference Board."

Just A Second rebounds with community help

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Just A Second Shop is back in business, thanks in large part to the generosity of Toronto's Jewish community.

Last week – in fact, a month to the day after the Jan. 6 fire that gutted the store – Andrea Pines of Jewish Family & Child Service and Klara Ifrah, Just A Second manager, sat in the long, very narrow "office" of their temporary location, and expressed their amazement and gratitude, while almost a dozen customers browsed the racks of men's, women's and children's clothing.

The fire, which began in the basement and for which no cause has been determined, occurred on a Saturday, when nobody was in the building. By the next morning, people were calling to see how they could help, said Pines, who oversees the shop as JF&CS's co-ordinator of volunteer services.

"It's just unbelievable," said Ifrah. "The community responded in a way that I didn't expect." Within a week, she noted, the store was restocked, enabling it to open on Jan. 24, much sooner than she expected.

Clothing drives are still being held at day schools and synagogues as well as by various groups, noted Pines. "The response has been incredible, and we want people to continue."

The store will need everything from light fixtures on down, in order to reopen in its original location at Bathurst Street and York Downs Avenue, she said.

Approximately 2,500 JF&CS clients on financial assistance – about one-third of the store's clientele – shop for used clothing and household items for free at Just A Second. Clients of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services have a similar arrangement.

At the store's temporary location (3544 Bathurst, just south of Baycrest Avenue) which is being rented for three months, a wide selection of clothing occupies most of the retail space.

Dishes and glassware are arranged neatly along a side wall, and shoulder-high shelves of shoes divide the front of the store from the tiny work area at the back, where employees and volunteers sort and tag new donations behind a table piled so high with clothes that they can't see beyond it.

On an average day, said Ifrah, the store serves about 100 customers. She has a staff of three and at least one or two volunteers a day.

Ifrah mentioned her appreciation, in particular, for the "nice, clean, beautiful" clothes being donated, and noted that household items like dishes, cutlery, small appliances, bedding, towels, toys and books are also needed.

Volunteers are welcome too, she said, even it it's just for a couple of hours at a time.

In addition to helping clients and offering a service to customers from the general community, any money generated by the store is used to send children to summer camp.

Clothing or household items can be donated at the store itself (open Monday to Thursday, 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., and 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Sundays); or at the yellow JF&CS clothing boxes, located at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Bathurst Street and Hillmount Avenue; the Thornhill branch of Associated Hebrew Schools, 300 Atkinson Ave.; the Bathurst Jewish Centre at 4588 Bathurst St.; and outside the temporarily closed Just A Second Shop at 4117 Bathurst St.

Exton was a prominent community activist

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

TORONTO — Eric Exton, a prominent businessman and community activist, died suddenly in Florida on Feb. 3 of a heart attack. He was 81.

Exton's son Lennie, told The CJN that 17 years ago he had had a triple bypass operation and "knew that every day was a gift."

Exton was born in Freital, Germany in 1919, the son of a successful department store owner. In 1939, he was able to leave for England.

When war broke out, however, he was interned as an enemy alien, first on the Isle of Man, and then in Sherbrooke, Quebec.

Thanks to his sister, Ilona Heller, who was already in Canada, he was one of the first internees to be released. He worked for Atlas Chemicals and Sandoz, as well as serving in the Canadian army.

Eric Exton

Exton became a partner in Giftcraft Ltd., a giftware distributor. In 1954, he left Giftcraft to became a builder, renovator and a mortgage broker. His company, Seel Enterprises, was the first publicly listed mortgage investment corporation in Canada.

He retired from active work in 1985, for health reasons.

During those years, he twice chaired the advisory board of the Ontario department of consumer and commercial affairs, and became president of the society of Ontario Mortgage Brokers.

Exton was very active at the Baycrest Centre, serving, among other posts, as chair of the budget and finance committee; treasurer; vice-president; president; chairman of the board, and officer and vice president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

He held leadership positions in B'nai Brith and Hillel; was founding president and chairman of the board of Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem; president of Ontario region and national president of Jewish National Fund of Canada; president of the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce; chair of the inaugural convention of the Federated Zionist Organization of Canada; treasurer of Canadian Jewish Congress and member of the community relations committee.

He endowed the Esther Exton Child Care Centre at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the Exton Board Room at Baycrest, and lobbies at Adath Israel Synagogue, Boys Town and the Lipa Green Building.

Exton did not confine his activities to Jewish philanthropic efforts. He was involved with the Metropolitan Zoological Society, the Canadian Geriatric Research Foundation, the League for Human Rights, United Appeal, Canadian Opera Company, the Stratford Shakespearean Festival, Art Gallery of Ontario. Royal Ontario Museum and the Toronto symphony.

Among the honours he was awarded were the B'nai Brith George Shnier Memorial Award, the Jewish National Fund Peace Award, the Canada Birthday Award and the Canada Volunteer Award of Merit. He was and Israel Bonds and Negev Dinner honoree.

Exton was predeceased by his first wife, Esther. He is survived by his wife Annette, children Sybil, Lennie and Mardi, sister Illona Heller, and six grandchildren.

Jerusalem no longer listed as a country

TORONTO — Toronto travel executive David Freudmann's campaign to end the tourism industry's discrimination against Jerusalem has paid off.

The publishers of the Official Airline Guide (OAG), a telephone book-sized directory of flights to and from all countries, will no longer list Jerusalem as a country.

In fact, the guide's time charts, which list times in all nations compared to Greenwich Mean Time, will de-list Jerusalem altogether, as the city's Atarot airport has been closed for months anyway due to the recent turmoil in the Mideast.

Freudmann, vice-president of sales at UniWorld Travel and Tourism Inc., noticed a few months ago that Jerusalem was the only city in the guide to be listed as a country, something he called "a political statement." [The CJN, Jan. 18].

He was told by the OAG's publishers that Jerusalem is disputed territory.

Freudmann said he's "somewhat satisfied" by the decision to remove Jerusalem from the time charts. But he added he's still unhappy because Jerusalem will continue to be listed under city headings, but minus any reference to Israel.

All other cities' headings are accompanied by the countries they are in. Jerusalem will be listed by its international code assignment (JRS) but without "Israel" next to it.

Freudmann said he was told that the OAG must follow guidelines put forward by the International Air Travel Association.

Conservative women rabbis hold conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For a young Canadian woman in her first year of rabbinical school, attending a session facilitated by Rabbi Amy Eilberg – the first woman ever ordained as a Conservative rabbi – and thanking her, was both overwhelming and humbling.

"She opened the door [with her 1985 ordination at the Jewish Theological Seminary], and it's now up to me to keep it open," said Robyn Fryer in a recent phone interview from Los Angeles, where she is studying at the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the University of Judaism.

Fryer, a Toronto native, was a delegate at a two-day New York conference held at the end of January for women rabbis and rabbinical students, sponsored by the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly.

The power of women's voices, davening together, was "so beautiful," Fryer said.

The name chosen for the conference, M'Me'ah v'Esrim (Hebrew for From 120), signifies that the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) will ordain its 120th woman at this spring's commencement.

The number is "a big celebration of strength," said JTS rabbinical student Jill Borodin, also a Torontonian. Borodin, who will graduate this year, was involved in planning the conference, which 100 women attended.

"It was fantastic," she said. "It was really exciting to see this community of women, and to see what different women are doing. It was a very positive thing for me, as someone on the edge of ordination, to see so many women happy as rabbis in a fulfilling, meaningful career, and becoming more and more accepted."

Keynote speaker Francine Klagsbrun, a writer and one of the members of the 1985 commission that recommended female ordination, told the 100 participants that their "presence has transformed the Jewish world."

The conference combined study of Jewish texts, communal worship, workshops on "nurturing ourselves" as individuals and spiritual leaders, and lively dancing to the music of Mikveh, a female klezmer band.

For Borodin's generation of women rabbis, defining themselves as rabbis is less about proving they can do the job than it was for their predecessors, she said.

For Canadians who might want to return here, however, career options are limited because of the dearth of egalitarian congregations.

In the United States, Rabbi Miriam Berkowitz noted, Conservative synagogues that would not hire a woman rabbi are the exception.

Rabbi Berkowitz, a Montrealer (née Carey Knight, but now using her Hebrew name and married surname) is the third woman to serve as assistant rabbi at Manhattan's Park Avenue Synagogue. She was ordained three years ago at the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies (JTS' Jerusalem campus).

"On the surface, we don't have to fight for legitimacy," she said. "There are plenty of jobs, and we can make a living."

There are more subtle problems, however. She cited issues of respect, compensation and authority. "Even though we're 'allowed' to be rabbis, it still hasn't filtered down into everyone's consciousness."

Her comments about the conference, however, were unreservedly positive. "I found it wonderful on many levels – it was a chance to speak with the students, see old friends, catch up with what everyone's doing. The praying, the singing, hearing the voices and having the chance to study together were wonderful."

The conference also offered a "greater sense of being normal," particularly for the Israeli women rabbis. "They're really a drop in the bucket out there."

One issue that arose at the conference was the Conservative movement's refusal to recognize women as witnesses in marriage, conversion or divorce.

That issue, which was not on the conference agenda but was discussed in the halls, is currently under discussion by the movement's law committee.

Several women at the conference said they already serve as witnesses.

Rabbi Berkowitz, who wrote her thesis at Machon Schechter on the issue, said there is nothing to indicate that women are unfit as witnesses, but rabbinic interpretation has led to the practice of using only men as witnesses in certain situations.

Although she believes a change is necessary, she noted that a conversion, marriage or divorce would not be recognized in Israel, or by Orthodox authorities here, if any of the witnesses were women.

"In the beginning I just went along with it," Rabbi Berkowitz said. But these days, if, for example, a conversion student requests her as a witness – and is aware of the consequences – she will agree. In a recent case, she served as part of an all-female beit din for a conversion; the next day, three male colleagues performed the same role "to cover their bases."

Balancing a perpetually on-call career with family life is also a challenge.

Rabbi Avis Miller of Adas Israel Congregation in Washington, D.C., said women rabbis may ultimately persuade synagogues to treat them like doctors who have practices.

Instead of expecting each rabbi to be available around the clock, she said, synagogues with more than one rabbi may simply ensure that one rabbi is on call at any time, freeing others to spend time with their families.

Rabbi Berkowitz finds it ironic that having women rabbis is perceived as watering down the tradition. "It's actually being more religious, because there are more people learning and more people taking on the mitzvot. I think it's a waste of resources to cut out half the Jewish people and say they can't be leaders."

Although women currently comprise less than 10 percent of the Conservative rabbinical pool, the number is on the upswing. In Fryer's class this year, the majority of students (12 of 19) are women.

Jewish poverty is no surprise to Carleton U social work prof

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It may come as a shock to some that the level of Jewish poverty in Canada more or less mirrors the national average.

But to Allan Moscovitch, a Carleton University professor of social work and an authority on welfare, this is hardly a surprising fact.

Moscovitch, whose interest in the issue springs from a basic "humanitarian concern for other members of society," is an expert on Jewish poverty.

Over the past four years, he has been involved in major initiatives in Ottawa to identify and reduce the prevalence of Jewish poverty in the nation's capital.

Working closely with the Jewish community, and particularly with the Jewish Family Services of which he is a vice-president, he helped establish two special task forces that have issued reports about the Jewish poor.

Using Statistics Canada criteria, Moscovitch – the former director of Carleton University's School of Social Work – determined that nearly 17 percent of Jewish-Canadians can be classified as poor.

Among Jews, he found, children and the elderly are gripped by the highest rates of poverty.

His data indicates that 27 percent of the Jewish poor are children and youth and almost 21 percent are older than 65.

According to Moscovitch, fairly new immigrants represent 40 percent of the total number of low-income Jews. "These people are most likely to be over 65."

The highest incidence of Jewish poverty is in Quebec, but the lowest Jewish poverty rate is in eastern Canada.

Moscovitch, born in Montreal, warns that poverty in Canada is more of a serious problem than many Canadians realize.

"Canada's record in the reduction of inequality is not an enviable one in relation to other industrial nations," he explained. "It is in a group of neo-conservative industrial nations – Britain, Australia and the United States – that spend relatively less on social problems than those in central and northern Europe.

"Poverty rates, especially for children, remain considerably higher in Canada than in these non-English speaking countries."

Currently, Moscovitch is completing a report on economic conditions among Canadian aboriginals. It will be published later this year.

The data is less than encouraging. "The poverty rate of off-reserve Indians and Métis is about two to two and a half times the national rate. The on-reserve rate cannot be calculated at present but is likely to be considerably higher."

In his view, poverty can be substantially reduced if certain measures are adopted.

- Reform provincial welfare systems so that they are more supportive than punitive.
- Establish national standards for provincial income security.
- Include drugs in medicare and introducing a national dental plan.
- Bring in a minimum wage rate so that a family can live on the proceeds of a 40-hour a week job.
- Increase the availability of grant programs to cover the cost of education and training for welfare recipients.
- Improve compulsory benefits to low wage workers.
- Expand child benefits, child care programs and services for the disabled.
- Restore a national program of social housing.
- Reform the federal system of income support and social services for Indians on reserves.

From 1990 to 1993, Moscovich chaired an Ontario government advisory group studying social assistance legislation.

"We wrote a model report on how to reform a welfare system to support people in poverty and in crisis who can become partially, if not wholly, independent."

Bob Rae's social democratic government implemented some of the recommendations. "Much of what was done was undone by the relentlessly punitive approach of the Harris government," he said.

Moscovitch, the author of three books on the welfare state, charged that Premier Mike Harris turned to "simple solutions" to change Ontario's welfare system.

In particular, he is scathing in his criticism of Harris' workfare plan. "It may be ideologically appealing to those who wish to punish welfare recipients for being poor. But it cannot be done successfully on the cheap, and that is what the province has been attempting to do. So it doesn't work."

Asked if governments are trying to phase out welfare all together, Moscovitch replied, "They are trying to reduce costs by putting recipients under pressure. To reduce costs, many provinces have cut out the kind of support services that could assist people getting off welfare."

Moscovitch, whose wife is a trade union researcher, teaches courses on social policy and administration at Carleton, where he has taught since 1975.

He fervently believes that the eradication of poverty in is everyone's interests. As he put it: "Taking care of others is the way to create a better society for all, not only the marginalized. Making sure that all members of society have a share in its resources is the best way of ensuring that they have a stake in its future."

Judaism and medicine share unique relationship

'As religious Jews, do we have the right to heal?'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judaism and medicine have always shared a close and unique relationships, says Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

"Throughout history, many rabbis have preferred to earn their livelihood through medicine than through Torah study," he said at a recent lecture co-sponsored by the synagogue and the Canadian chapter of the Israel Medical Association.

Over nine percent of medical practitioners in North America are Jewish, he said, and 20 percent of Nobel Prize winners since the mid-1960s have been Jewish.

To understand the relationship between Judaism and medicine, however, we have to ask if the belief in God necessitates the belief that a person's life span is pre-determined, Rabbi Shulman said.

"As religious Jews, do we have the right to heal?" he asked.

A "splinter" group of Jews believes that healing is in the realm of God, he said, "but the codes of Jewish law reject this [theory]. The Talmud cites a moral responsibility to heal – 'ye shall not stand idly by the blood of your neighbours.' If physicians withhold their services, it is as if they are shedding blood."

One verse of the Talmud authorizes doctors to heal, he said, and another verse commands them to heal.

"Why do we both authorize and demand? There is an element of danger in every medical procedure; what heals one person harms another. The Torah frees doctors from moral consequences if they have tried to heal.

"The Torah sees the physician as an agent of [God]. True healing lies with God, but God grants physicians the agency to heal."

Travelling through time, said Rabbi Shulman, we see many sages who embraced medicine because of its humane nature. "A number of them claimed to have had unique medical knowledge."

Shmuel, a rabbi, physician and astronomer, was a leading sage in talmudic discussion, he said.

"His name is mentioned 4,000 times in the Babylonian Talmud. His knowledge of medicine was wide-ranging, and he talked about [such areas] as obstetrics, dermatology, cardiology and pediatrics. He was also famous for an eye ointment.

"It was Shmuel that said the loss of limb is equivalent to the loss of life, so a limb can be set on Shabbat," Rabbi Shulman said.

In all of history, though, no scholar made as great a contribution as Maimonides, he said. "No one understood the synthesis between talmudic scholarship and medicine better than [he]."

Maimonides took the Talmud – written in a stream of consciousness with topics scattered throughout – and restructured and organized it. "He wrote a code of Jewish law in 14 volumes which remains unprecedented and unrivaled, and his medical writing was as clear as his talmudic writing," he said.

Maimonides' medical works are all based on rational medicine; the element of superstition was eliminated, Rabbi Shulman said.

"He broke medicine into prevention, cure and convalescence. He advised exercise and sunshine, and recognized that diabetes is related to sugar. He also recognized that cancer should be treated early.

"Where would medical and Jewish law be without Maimonides?"

HUC-JIR celebrates its 125th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The quality of religious life is one of the biggest issues facing Reform Jews today, says an associate professor of rabbinics at Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion.

"The time was when [we were most concerned] with social action – looking outward to social and political issues and seeking remedies that correspond to our religious view," Rabbi Mark Washofsky said from his office in Cincinnati.

"We still do that, but we are also now concerned with issues concerning worship and religious experience, such as how congregants observe Shabbat, and what our people get out of Jewish worship. We have mostly left it to be resolved individually. Now we are acting on it as a movement," he said.

Rabbi Washofsky is one of three HUC-JIR faculty members who will be visiting Canadian synagogues next month.

They are part of a large number of scholars, rabbis, cantors, students and staff affiliated with the institution who will be visiting synagogues across North America in celebration of the 125th anniversary of the founding of HUC-JIR.

The school, which has branches in Cincinnati, Los Angeles, New York and Jerusalem, is the academic centre of Reform Judaism.

Their current internal agenda, said Rabbi Washofsky, is "to concentrate on study, education, prayer and observance. How committed are we? How do we create a generation of committed children?"

They have attempted to build more summer camps and have put more emphasis on education and worship, he said.

While visiting synagogues in Toronto, he said, he plans on talking about the tension in Reform Judaism between autonomy and Jewishness.

"Reform Jews need to construct a Jewish life in a movement that guarantees free choice. They have to tolerate free choice but still remain in a meaningful Jewish community.

"Despite what we may hear, Halachah, which tends not to look at personal autonomy, plays a powerful role in shaping who we are. I am interested in this choice between Halachah and free choice," he said.

Jews from all denominations approach their rabbis with questions, he said, and the rabbis give their response. "We do the same thing. We study Jewish legal documents as Reform or liberal Jews and find our own identity, as other Jews do."

Looking back over the past number of years, Rabbi Washofsky said the biggest change at the college has been the ordination of women, who now form 50 percent of the ordination classes.

"At our school, the ordination of women is not a big issue; it was a noteworthy event that changed the college. If success is indicated by how many women occupy pulpits, however, than we have a long way to go.

"We do not see large numbers of women in 'e-sized' congregations, those with more than 1,000 family members. It could be that they have found others kinds of fulfilling employment," he said.

The best indication that we have stopped thinking of the ordination of women as a new thing is if we stop referring to them as women rabbis, Rabbi Washofsky said.

HUC-JIR's commitment to Israel has changed dramatically since the turn of last century, he said.

"Back then, the Reform movement was known to be neutral at best and hostile at worst to the Zionist movement. Although some persist in thinking that it is still true, it definitely is not."

For the past 30 years, all students have spent their first year at the college at its campus in Jerusalem, he said.

"This is both as a Hebrew teaching device, and as an acquaintance with the country's people and culture. One cannot function as a rabbi in a liberal congregation without this acquaintance."

The Reform movement is committed to the progressive Jewish movement in Israel, he said, and wants it to be active in Israeli society.

"The results are mixed. Our synagogues tend to be crowded with bar and bat mitzvahs and wedding celebrations. We see evidence that more and more Israelis are looking to us as their religious home.

Depression survivor helps shed light on her illness

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Karen Liberman will talk about her illness to anyone who will listen.

As a survivor of clinical depression, she travels the country speaking to groups about hope, recovery and healing.

Liberman, 54, who was recently honoured as a health hero by Chatelaine magazine for her volunteer work in the field of mental health, says, "Having survived, I have a profound sense of gratitude and blessing. I feel I have to give back."

In her talks she speaks about the sometimes humourous happenings on the psychiatric ward, and the importance of disclosure and breaking down the stigma of mental illness.

"It is really a physical illness of brain chemistry," says Liberman, director of training and communications at the Social Planning Council of Toronto, an executive member of the Mood Disorders Association, and mother of two.

"My mother had bi-polar disorder, and when you talk about secrecy and shame, that pervasive shame always carried with me."

Her own "descent into hell" began in 1987. "If we were to take a survey, I would have been chosen as the person least likely to be depressed. I am naturally upbeat and outgoing.

"About 1985, however, things just weren't right. I was not Karen. I denied anything was wrong, but eventually the wheels fell off the bus; I descended into a black horror."

Throughout the next 10 years, she was hospitalized 17 times, treated by six different psychiatrists, had a few suicide attempts, tried 27 types of medication and underwent 24 electroshock therapy treatments.

"It was a decade of darkness," she says.

A pivotal moment in her illness came when she was talking with a group of friends, and her husband asked her not to air "'her dirty laundry.' I realized then that people who have a mental illness are dirty laundry. If I had had another illness, I would not have been thought of in that way."

Karen Liberman

In 1997, Liberman says, she finally found help. "I met a psychopharmacologist who agreed to take me on, and we found the right medication. I also made fairly significant life changes, and left my 32-year marriage."

Since then, she says, she has never looked back. "I finally knew the difference between feeling better and truly being well. I had come back to myself."

She is convinced that "God meant for me to take this journey. I would never wish it on others, but I also would never change it. Every single day is a blessing, and I take nothing for granted.

"Even during a difficult time, I know the tears are there because at that moment I am unhappy. My emotions are normal."

As a recent guest on an online forum about mental illness, it struck her, she says, how many people were affected by it. "If you don't have the illness, someone you know does. It is essential to bring it into the light.

"Confronting a mental illness and putting a name to it puts a cast around the soul. That helps it heal."

She speaks to people because she wants them to understand that a change in someone's brain chemistry can "disturb every action. A mood disorder robs people of their essence.

"My job is to let other people know. I am trying to help people get it. If one person who has had an illness can help one other person to understand, that will shed some light.

"Everyone's illness is a journey, and they all reach their own significant sign posts along the way. People come to hear me because listening to my message helps them along their journey."

Rosenblum eases transition to seniors' residence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sharon Rosenblum, director of admissions and marketing at Terrace Gardens Retirement Residence, says working with seniors opens up a window on her life.

"Speaking with them on a daily basis, they are able to bring out parts of me that no one else can tap into," she says.

Sharon Rosenblum

Rosenblum, who has been at Terrace Gardens for about one year, is often the first person that people speak to when considering a retirement residence for a family member.

"I take them on a tour, and then they usually come back with the prospective resident. I'll also go out to a private home or hospital to meet with them, assess how the resident would fit in, and determine the level of care that is required."

Terrace Gardens, which has available private or semi-private accommodation, offers 24-hour health care, a kosher kitchen supervised by COR, daily activities and short-term respite and trial stays.

The residence is a member of the Ontario Residential Care Association (ORCA), and has received a three-year accreditation without reservation, the highest accreditation available, Rosenblum says.

"My aim is to make the transition into the residence easy, because I know what a difficult decision it is to move a parent from their home.

"Most children suffer guilt and remorse; I try to make it a pleasant experience," says Rosenblum, who is a mother of four and grandmother of 12.

With a chaplaincy volunteer services certificate from Jewish Family and Child Service, she has worked with the Jewish Chaplaincy of Toronto visiting and acting as an advocate for hospital patients.

"When this position became available, I jumped at the chance because I was familiar with the residence and I wanted to work with the Jewish community."

Spotlight

Part of Rosenblum's job includes working with discharge planners at various hospitals in order to make arrangements for patients who are not able to return home, and running programs such as a cabaret for the residents, and a medical symposium and Judaica exhibit which are open to the public.

"I want people to come in and see what we are all about. I'm a people person. I enjoy interacting with everyone, especially the residents. I find it very rewarding.

"Until you work with seniors, you do not understand how much they can add to your life. They have a history and an understanding of life that most of them are happy to share."

WHAT IS THE CANADIAN SOCIETY FOR THE WEIZMANN INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE?

In the Fall of 1966, the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science was formed. The Canadian Society has played a leading role in marshaling Canadian support for the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot, Israel.

Through the Canadian Society, Canadians have played a decisive role in the Institute's progress. There are innumerable research scholarships, bursaries, and a myriad of endowment grants funding various aspects of basic and applied research. Funds raised are used to build and maintain scientific facilities; acquire costly up-to-date research equipment and instrumentation; set up endowments for research centres; establish professional chairs and scholarships.

"The Canadian presence at the Institute has long been strong and vivid, finding expression in a literally dazzling array of such activities and projects as the Canada Centre for Nuclear Physics and its magnificent Koffler Tower, the Canadian Institute for the Energies and Applied Research, a host of professional chairs all endowed by Canadians, tens of laboratories, scholarships, bursaries and a thriving student loan fund. But, most meaningfully, it is expressed in the warm personal relationships formed between Institute scientists and the ranking members of the Canadian Society"...
- Michael Sela, Past President and Deputy Chairman of the Institute's Board of Governors

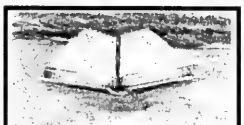
Jewish Life

An intellectual discipline

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN



Our sages produced wonderful dicta that contain wisdom touching upon elemental aspects of being human.

Perhaps the largest collection of these dicta is Pirkei Avot, Sayings of the Fathers, from the Mishnah. One example of this genre appears in the first chapter of Pirkei Avot. "Not the expounding of the law is the important matter, but the doing of it."

Simply put, it is the action that counts and not the words. But is this not apparent and obvious? Is this not an accepted convention of human existence? I would answer, to paraphrase Porgy and Bess, it is not necessarily so.

In the annals of evil that was Nazism, the case of Martin Heidegger (1889-1976) would not seem to be of great consequence. He was not a leader of the Nazi Party, nor was he directly connected with the death camps. In another sense, however, his case was one of the genuine horrors of Nazism: he was one of the greatest, if not the greatest, philosopher of the twentieth century and he was a Nazi.

That Heidegger or anyone else was a great philosopher cannot be easily proven. The number of entries by and about him in the Library of Congress catalogue is one of the largest for any twentieth-century philosopher, and just recently, a concordance that indexes every word in his seminal work Being and Time has appeared. While all this does not constitute a philosophic argument for his stature, it is some indication of his influence.

As to Heidegger's Nazism, while much of it is in dispute, certain elementary facts are clear. In 1933, he joined the Nazi Party and was elected Rektor of the University of Freiburg, replacing a social democrat who had been dismissed by the Nazis. Among his statements as Rektor was the following: "Precepts and ideas are not now the rules of your being: the Fuehrer is your one and only present and future German reality and law."

Was Heidegger also an anti-Semite during this period? This has been contested, but a curious incident casts doubt on these denials. A certain Dr. Baumgarten (not Jewish) had applied for acceptance as an SA stormtrooper and had given Heidegger as a reference.

Heidegger, however, was not very enthusiastic about his candidacy and wrote: "Dr. Baumgarten stems both family-wise and intellectually from the liberal-democratic Heidelberg circle around Max Weber. During his stay here, he was anything but a national socialist… After Baumgarten failed with me, he kept up very lively relations with the Jew, Frankel, who had been active in Goettingen and has now been terminated here."

When made aware of this charge, Dr. Baumgarten produced a sworn affidavit that he had never laid eyes on "the Jew Frankel" and thereby gained admission to the SA. It is thus quite clear that Heidegger was – to say the least – not entirely free of anti-Semitism. No one with fundamental objections to anti-Semitism could have joined the Nazis, even as early as 1933.

In 1934, Heidegger resigned the Rektorship and after that, his enthusiasm for the Fuehrer and National Socialism clearly subsided. Nevertheless, after the war, not once did he utter a word of sorrow for what Germany had done to its victims. Instead, he tried to portray himself as an anti-Nazi who had joined the party only to protect the University of Freiburg. He did not want to join what he considered the post-war cowards who reneged on their original loyalty. He was not going to besmirch a holy cause of his life. In that way, he remains fixed in history as a Nazi.

All this would be of very limited interest had Heidegger not been a truly great philosopher who had also been a Nazi. Professor Michael Wychsogrod, whose work provides the details and foundation for this article, came to understand this when he first began studying Heidegger's writings a number of years ago.

Wychsogrod also learned something important about philosophy: that some people think of it as a religion. But philosophy is not religion; it is, exclusively, an intellectual discipline. In philosophy, all that matters is whether what you say is true and profound. And if it is, then you are a great philosopher, no matter what you do.

Thus the example of Heidegger teaches us the limitations of study and thought and the importance of deeds. It was a lesson our sages learned long ago. In this age of information, let us also learn from and follow it.

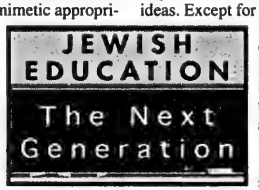
Learning beyond the book

By ELLIOTT MALAMET



Although we take pride in our reputation as "the people of the book," there can be some unwelcome aspects of this legacy when it comes to the education of our children. Does the commitment to book learning, the mimetic appropriation of reality through the printed word, actually block our children's ability to access the spiritual content at the heart of Judaism and indeed, of the world itself?

In his magnum opus Jerusalem, Moses Mendelssohn outlines the potentially destructive influence of that ostensibly benign object – the book:

"We teach and instruct one another only through writings. We learn to know nature and man only through writings. We work and relax, edify and amuse ourselves only through overmuch writing. Everything is dead letter; the spirit of living conversation has vanished."

Whether or not Mendelssohn should be taken utterly seriously or whether he is rehearsing an argument in deliberately exaggerated form, his – well, okay – writings attest to a Judaism that has lost the ability to convert words into living realities. I do not sense, even in Orthodox institutions, that for the majority of students, learning Talmud per se is an edifying experience.

This does not mean that texts do not impart information or even powerful ideas. Except for a minority, the idea of learning a "blat Gemarah" – with Rashi and Tosfot – is not a big uplift. (I say this last ruefully, as I am a big fan of textual learning).

Without the requisite textual skills, students will be lost in the foreign country of Judaism without a passport or sufficient funds. But unless the students are allowed to break out of the guided tour we provide and really explore the territory on their own, it will remain a disappointing journey that they will not want to repeat. Translation: textual analysis must be combined with other forms of learning in order to help the student truly internalize the Torah's perspective on life.

Take, for example, the part of the curriculum dealing with kashrut. Food is an enormously important topic – it touches upon aspects of holiness, body image, attractiveness, health, socializing, even identity. Instead of simply discussing what is allowed and what is forbidden, one could also examine ideas such as, the Torah view on a meaningful dinner conversation; vegetarianism; nutrition and Jewish body images; fasting and its relation to current eating disorders; food as a social event and the dilemma of dining with non-Jews as it pertains to interdating/intermarriage; and how to make eating a spiritual event.

Several potential field trips or speakers could be integrated into the curriculum: meeting with rabbis who would explain how kashrut is supervised, visiting a food plant, holding a cooking demonstration using kosher recipes, visiting the supermarket to review how to find and identify kosher products, demonstrating how a kosher kitchen is created and maintained, giving a lecture by a psychological professional on the "emotional uses/abuses" of food.

Schools obviously differ regarding the exact definition of their respective mandates. Are they in the business of creating "serious" Jews? "Observant" Jews? Jews who identify with Judaism? Jews who will be community leaders? Whatever the goal, the curriculum must move towards a model of fusing academic study with the experience of "orienting moments" where scholarship can be brought to life and life can be brought to words.

Jewish Life

Where universes meet

The Talmud and the Internet: A Journey Between Worlds*, by Jonathan Rosen, Douglas & McIntyre, $26.95.

Do the Talmud and Internet have anything in common? Jonathan Rosen, author of the well-received novel Eve's Apple and former literary editor of the Forward, grapples with this question in this unusual and original book.

Books
Bernard Baskin

His self-questioning journey begins with reflections on the two strands of Jewish history represented by his two grandmothers: one, American-born, modern in sensibility and liberal in religious faith; the other, East European Orthodox, long-suffering and murdered by the Nazis.

In some strange way, the contrast between the two grandmothers' fates is embodied in the contradictions between the Talmud as "ancient tradition" and the Internet as contemporary "chaos."

Rosen writes, "The loose, associative logic of the Internet, and the culture it reflects, is not merely a mirror of the disruptions of a broken world but offers a kind of disjointed harmony. The Talmud helped Jews survive after the destruction of the Temple by making Jewish culture portable and personal. In the same way, there are elements in the inclusiveness of the Internet well-suited to a world that is both more uprooted and more connected than ever before."

For hundreds of years, Rosen makes clear that responsa, questions on virtually every aspect of Jewish life, went back and forth between scattered Jews and various centres of talmudic learning. The Internet is also a world of unbounded curiosity, of argument and information, where anyone with modem can wander out of the wilderness for a while, ask a question and receive an answer. Rosen takes comfort in thinking that a modern technological medium echoes an ancient one.

The author suggests that the Rabbis referred to the Talmud as a yam, a sea, and though one is hardly intended to "surf" the Talmud, something more than oceanic metaphors links the two verbal universes: "Vastness and an uncategorizable nature are in part what define them both."

But ultimately, Rosen realizes that unlike the Talmud, the Internet has "no moral centre." Indeed, the Web page and a page of Talmud may be collections of basic or core material built around intricately interlocking commentaries, but the similarity is somewhat forced and not especially compelling.

What is noteworthy, however, about this splendidly written volume are the author's ruminations about such historical figures as Rabbi Akiva, his wisdom and martyrdom; Yochanan ben Zakkai, who, very much alive in his coffin, outwitted the Romans and established the yeshiva that helped secure the survival of Judaism; Henry Adams, fascinated with the energy of the dynamo-electric machine as the symbol of a new age, and the ambiguous life of Josephus, traitor and Jewish historian.

This book is much more concerned with the Talmud than the Internet and the aggadic (rabbinic) homilies and illustrations from its pages are astute and pertinent.

This little book – intelligent and engaging – is well worth reading.

Time for some Jewish humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Q: Noah's ark was built in three storeys, and the top storey had a window to let light in. But how did they get light to the bottom two storeys?

A: They used floodlights. [http://ezra.mts.jhu.edu/~rabbiars/humor/riddles.html]

Oy!

Purim is just a few weeks away, so that means it's time for my annual look at Jewish humour on the Internet. But first, a disclaimer. I try to recommend sites that entertain, but on the Internet you never really know what you're going to come across. So be warned.

The online Jewish Magazine includes a hefty supply of jokes in every issue [http://www.jewishmag.com]. A sample: Harry was a good and pious man who was greeted by God himself after he passed away. God asked him if he was hungry and they shared a can of tuna. Meanwhile, Harry noticed that way down in the other place, people were feasting on caviar, champagne, lamb, truffles and brandy. After this happened a couple of times Harry asked why all he got was tuna. "To be honest, Harry," God said, "for two people, it doesn't pay to cook." [http://www.jewishmag.com/25mag/humor/humor.htm]

With so many incredible Jewish comedians out there, where would you start if you wanted to honour them? How about Alan King and Carl Reiner? The National Foundation for Jewish Culture presented its first award to actor/comedian/boxer/Catskills tummler Alan King. And its second award went to Carl Reiner, award-winning writer, director, performer and half of the 2000-Year-Old-Man duo [http://www.15minutesmagazine.com/archives/Issue%2008/national_foundation.htm].

You can listen to generous excerpts of the classic skits with Reiner, as Mel Brooks shares his millennial memories. "I have over 42,000 children. And not one comes to visit me." [http://www.haruth.com/JhumorListenG.html]. After that, take in a charming interview with Carl Reiner at Virtual Jerusalem radio [http://www.vjradio.com/luminary.htm], where he reminisces about his Jewish roots, his early years and his years in show biz.

Speaking of Carl Reiner, William Swislow argues that despite its cast, Carl Reiner's Dick Van Dyke Show was one of the most Jewish sitcoms TV had seen until Seinfeld [http://www.interestingideas.com/ii/rob.htm].

A while back, Lou Bega came out with the popular tune Mambo No. 5. "A little bit of Monica in my life/ A little bit of Erica in my life..." Catchy? Perhaps. But I prefer listening to another version by "Louis Bagel" that has popped up on the Internet [http://members.theglobe.com/hwebdesign/MATZAH5.WAV]. This one is called Matzah No. 5.

I really love that Chanukah – it lasts eight nights.

A little bit of Passover is all right.

A really big bar mitzvah is what I had.

I'm moving to Miami just like my dad.

Rosh Hashanah is the Jewish New Year.

I really like a bagel with some shmeer.

My mother's name is Esther, my dad is Stan.

I like to go and see Barbra Streisand.

Anyone who has ever strained their eyes trying to decipher the strange symbols or "hechshers" attesting to the kashrut of a product will be thankful for the listing of Reliable Kosher Supervision [http://www.kashrus.org/kosher/symbol.html] provided by Rabbi E. Eidlitz, author of Is it Kosher? You'll find 50 kashrut symbols from Canada, England, France, Israel and the United States. But it seems they missed a few kashrut bodies that Jewish America has stumbled on [http://www.jewishamerica.com/ja/features/humor.cfm]:

- K sera sera: Hashgachah given by the more liberal branches of Judaism;
- I'm OK, you're OK: Under the supervision of the Orthodox Psychiatric Association;
- KO: Hashgachah of the World Boxing Federation;
- Mary K: Under strict supervision of Cosmetics Association;
- KGB: Russian hashgachah – no longer reliable;

Next week, more Jewish humour from the Web.

Liberty Grand
Entertainment Complex

THE GOVERNOR'S ROOM 12,000 sq. ft.
THE RENAISSANCE ROOM 7,000 sq. ft.
THE CENTENNIAL ROOM 7,000 sq. ft.

As one of Toronto's few traditional ballrooms, the Liberty Grand is the perfect spot for receptions from 150 to 3000. The Liberty Grand boasts three impressive grand banquet rooms decorated in a traditional early 1900's elegance. With brilliant crystal chandeliers, 27 ft. ceilings, iron-laced balconies and arched windows, you'll enjoy a luxurious feel of understated elegance.

COURTYARD & IMMEDIATE SURROUNDING GROUNDS 13,200 sq. ft.
ARTIFACTS BAR & LOUNGE 12,000 sq. ft.
AUDITORIUM & CHAPEL
TASTING ROOMS & BRIDAL SUITES
FOUR SPECTACULAR FOYERS
THREE SEPARATE KITCHENS

Note: The separate banquet rooms, foyers, courtyard and lounge transform into a unified space if required.

Standing majestically at Toronto's downtown lakefront, the Liberty Grand is the crown jewel of Exhibition Place. Originally constructed in 1926, this building has an impressive heritage. Not only have we recaptured the original features but we've restored the 1920's splendor and status as one of the city's finest.

Gracefully blending the exuberant Beaux Arts monumentality of the exterior with the classical interior finishes, you will enjoy the epitome of luxury and elegance. Dedicated to the highest standard of hospitality, the Liberty Grand offers the ultimate experience in customer service. This magnificent complex exudes an ambiance of style and refined beauty unparalleled in Toronto.

Scheduled to open June 2001

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 18 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 8 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Tuesday, March 20, 2001 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, 100 Elder St. (Overbrook/Wilmington). It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:30 p.m. This year Ines DiSanto of Chez Moi will be presenting her 2001 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

Situated on 52 wooded acres, near downtown Toronto, are the graceful Estates of Sunnybrook. The historic McLean and Vaughan Estates provide everything for your upcoming celebration.

At the Estates of Sunnybrook, you will see exquisitely decorated rooms, and experience the most superb cuisine in the city. The Estates can comfortably accommodate weddings with as many as 150 guests. Many celebrities have also chosen the Estates for their special wedding day.

Elegance captures your special day

Elizabethan style typical of a large stone country manor house. This exceptional restoration has retained all its historic character with two elegantly refurbished ballrooms, each with a capacity of 150.

The grandeur continues throughout the Estates with sculptured gardens, patios, and stone walkways overlooking the Don River ravine. Any part of this landscape makes the Vaughan Estate a photo opportunity for your bridal group, family and friends.

McLean House:
Stately Elegance Renewed

McLean House dates back to 1929, when James McLean commissioned architect Eric Arthur to design his stately family home.

The result was BayView, now known as McLean House - one of Ontario's finest Georgian-style mansions. Set amid the natural beauty of Gordon Culham's award winning landscaping, McLean House is as magnificent today as it was in the 1920s.

Say Lavee for great photography

Your wedding photographs and video will be the most cherished keepsake of that very special day. Do not compromise when choosing your professionals.

Lavee Studios is your 'one stop studio' offering complete photographic services. It has built its reputation on fine Bridal Portraiture and carried this tradition into Digital Photography and state-of-the-art DVD Digital Video Production.

Lavee Studios is renowned for high-end stylish wedding portaiture with very careful attention paid to artistic posing and lighting. Also featured at the trendy candid style and fun shots in B&W and Sepia.

At every function Joe Lavee is your photographer. He and his assistants are on the job from beginning to end. You will not get a "shooter" or a beginner. This, Joe has found, is the only way to ensure quality. "I stand behind my work personally. The results will be the same as what you see on the studio walls and the albums," he says.

Your proofs will be presented in an attractive album and all enlargements, including those in your bridal album will be custom printed, fully retouched and lacquered.

Lavee Video Productions Inc., has acquired a distinguished reputation in Toronto. They are, State-Of-The-Art, with special attention paid to fine editing and the clients' special requirements. Lavee Studios now offers the latest in digital photography, where you see your images on screen and choose the ones you prefer. Your choice is then printed and given to you.

This sophisticated digital system enables Lavee to create business and other portraits while you wait. Special artwork is created for digital photography done on location, such as Bar/Bat Mitzvahs, weddings, corporate, charity events and golf tournaments, personalizing them with text, borders and logos.

At Lavee Studios every State-Of-The-Art photographic service is available. Every package is tailored to suit your needs. Lavee Studios has been serving the community for over 20 years, and over 15 years at its present location at 119 Sheppard Ave. West.

Stavros elevates bespoke tailoring to an art form

Architecturally, Stavros Sartoriale on Cumberland St. is a marriage of warmth and elegance. Lofty ceilings, expansive display windows and a floor of fine-veined cream-coloured marble create spaciousness and light. Rich rosewood shelves brim with bolts of fine fabric.

Remodelled in September 1999, Stavros Sartoriale embodies a conscious choice to bring tried and proven craft traditions into the third millennium. Like a fine suit, this store is tailor-made.

Every Stavros suit is "bespoke": ordered by you, custom-made for you. Each takes three fittings, with every stitch sewn in-house by skilled artisans. In keeping with Stavros' high standards, each bolt of fabric he selects is manufactured expressly for him at the finest European mills.

When Stavros first opened his doors in Canada, 40 years ago, there were hundreds of bespoke tailors. Today, he's the last of his kind in Canada; but he's mentoring successors to continue the tradition.

A Stavros tuxedo will give you the look of distinction you desire at your next wedding or special event; there are many other formal occasions where it can double as a suit. Styles range from conservative to contemporary; single breasted jackets, for example, may have either peak or notch lapels.

From the work room (left) where garments are created to the elegant showroom (right), attention to detail is paramount

Stavros tuxedos are crafted from the traditional mohair. It's light in weight, but firm and lustrous, and doesn't wrinkle easily; this makes for a better appearance with less ironing and cleaning, hence less strain and longer wear.

Stavros' shirts are also custom-made. Here too, styles vary, in features such as wing or laid-down collars; and there's a wide selection of fabrics and patterns. Order any shirt you want, and its exquisite quality and glove-like fit will shine through.

Stavros offers every other article of custom formal wear you'll need to complete your ensemble. A smart custom vest is often just the right piece to unify your look. Only the accessories are ready-made, but they include everything from cufflinks to cummerbunds.

Designer clothing is supposed to offer style for the masses. Stavros offers both style and quality, tailored uniquely to make you look your very best. As manager Maurizio Viel says: "We dress very few; but these few, we dress well."

See Stavros Sartoriale for yourself, at 95 Cumberland St.; or call 416-924-8144 for an appointment. It will exceed your highest expectations.

Concord Photography: Have camera, will travel

To sum up his career as a photographer, Vladimir Bekker could coin the motto "Have camera, will travel". "We have customers across Toronto, and as far away as Michigan," says Bekker, who operates Concord Photography in Woodbridge.

"Last year, I shot a marriage in Switzerland; before that, a wedding in Israel."

Bekker's high-end craftsmanship makes him popular among budding brides and grooms, and in the Russian Jewish community. To him, photographing a wedding is a fine art, which he's been honing for 25 years. It's also a personal commitment. Bekker doesn't subcontract: he does your work himself.

Bekker likes photographing weddings because "there's more scope for creativity. People are more serious. Weddings allow us to show them our best." Both pre-set collections and full customizing are available.

Bekker marries contemporary posing techniques with avant-garde visual style. He makes creative use of multiple lenses, and of lighting above all; and he treats with loving care the so-called "minor details" that make all the difference. Prints are carefully retouched, for example, to soften skin texture.

"We also pay careful attention to wedding album design," he adds. "You need a proper frame to enhance the pictures and bring everything together."

Bekker has earned the kudos of his peers. In March 2000, his album won the prestigious Judges' Award at the Wedding Photographers' International Album Competition in Las Vegas.

Bekker first took up the camera as a child. He studied photography in university, among other subjects, and eventually came to practise his chosen profession full-time. After coming to Canada in 1989, Bekker found employment in a photography studio, where he also honed his business skills. In 1991, he opened his own studio in Concord.

Five years ago, Bekker moved to a Steeles Ave. plaza that is geared to weddings. There are about 60 services: you can find bridal gowns, invitations and other wedding necessities here. Bekker's future plans are to expand to Thornhill or Richmond Hill. Concord Photography is at 4040 Steeles Ave. West, unit 18. Hours are noon to 8:00 p.m., by appointment; call 416-410-1410 or 905-660-0000.

Jewish sorority chapter returns to York University

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Slowly but surely, a small group of less than a dozen female York University students has spent most of the past year resurrecting a local chapter of the Jewish sorority Sigma Delta Tau.

Once the fledgling executive has Gamma Omichron (originally formed in 1991) up and running, with a minimum of 30 members, it can become an official chapter of the national sorority. Gamma Omichron is open to girls studying at any Toronto-area college or university offering three-year degrees.

"For us, I think it completes the university experience. It provides a greater sense of community and involvement," said Adina Furman, vice-president of recruitment, at a recent chapter meeting she hosted.

Evelynn Sagal, chapter president, explained that because York is a commuter school, a sorority helps distinguish university from the high school experience.

Although another Jewish sorority, Delta Pi, has existed at York since at least the mid-1990s, Furman and Sagal felt it wasn't exactly what they wanted.

"They're a good group, and they do a lot of good in the community," said Sagal. But, Furman added, "it didn't feel like how I thought a sorority should feel."

They explained that they prefer a less hierarchical structure and what Furman described as a more egalitarian approach.

Both Jewish sororities and the Jewish fraternity AEPi maintain a low profile at York, which does not endorse such organizations. They are, however, affiliated with Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

The sorority is primarily but not exclusively Jewish, with activities including celebrations like Chanukah parties and Shabbat dinners. "We would never turn anyone away," said Naomi Peleg, vice-president and the chapter representative on York's Jewish Student Federation executive.

"It's a great organization to be part of," Peleg said. "You're a sister for life. It's a way to give back to the community that raised us."

Among the organization's "pearls," as it calls its areas of focus, are philanthropy, alumnae and academics. Members must maintain a certain average, and a weekly library study night is one of the activities of the Toronto group.

The focus of Sigma Delta Tau's charity work is child abuse prevention. At a recent meeting, the Toronto group discussed which local charities would be appropriate beneficiaries. Thus far, they have held activities but not fundraisers. Their next event is a post-exam party, to be held Feb. 22 at a downtown bar.

Dues of $173.65, which will be payable once the chapter is official, do not mean that the club is elitist, noted Sagal. There is a national scholarship fund available to help people who can't afford the dues, and chapters can also do their own fundraising.

Membership fees that are sent to the national office go toward insurance for group events, among other things, said Sagal. Other perks include a job placement program.

Sagal is particularly enthused about Sigma Delta Tau's four-week, new member program that fosters learning about themselves and each other.

Last April, a representative of Sigma Delta Tau's national council, based in the United States, visited Toronto to help them get up and running. The national organization has about 55 chapters, Sagal said. Most are in the States, where fraternities and sororities are more prevalent, but there was a chapter at McGill University in Montreal at one point, she added.

For further information about the sorority and its upcoming events, contact sdtgo@hotmail.com, or call Furman at 905-771-0004.

CANAVAN DISEASE
Are you a carrier?

Canavan Disease is an incurable genetically inherited neurodegenerative disease. DNA testing has begun, on a research basis, for those who could be at a high risk for having an affected child. While this is currently not a routine test in Canada, we are looking to test as many members of the community as possible to justify routine testing.

Eligibility includes those of Ashkenazi Jewish descent over the age of 18. Information, consent forms for signing and blood taking is available at the Bloodwork Clinic, M408, at The Hospital for Sick Children, Mon.-Fri. 7:30 am-4:30 pm (bring your OHIP card). If you need further information, please call Dr. Feigenbaum at 416-813-5333.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our sixth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 8. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 19, 2001. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors, such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat, Friday, March 2, 2001.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 8, 2001. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Winnipeg Vaad Ha'ir returns to old hechsher

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Vaad Ha'ir of Winnipeg has drawn back from MBK, the new hechsher introduced last August, Don Aronovich, the vaad's president, says.

Speaking at a public forum on kashrut held on Jan. 29 at the Shaarey Zedec Synagogue, Aronovich explained to a packed room why the organization was continuing instead with WK, the old symbol.

The story goes back at least 15 years when a dispute between Orthodox rabbis in the community led the WK symbol to be shunned by Orthodox members of the community and those abroad because its standards were not thought to be high enough.

Part of the difficulty in more recent years was that there was only one rabbi in the city willing and able to serve with the vaad (traditionally, three Orthodox rabbis served). Although very knowledgeable, the rabbi supervising WK is away for part of the year and the synagogue that he is associated with allows mixed seating.

Last August, Aronovitch, a past president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the vaad president since January 2000, announced at a special meeting of the board that, in consultation with representatives from the local Orthodox community and from cities in Eastern Canada, WK, the longtime symbol of kashrut in Winnipeg, was being replaced by a new hechsher, MBK.

The goals of the changes were, Aronovitch said, "to encourage and enhance the observance of kashrut in Winnipeg; to act as an agent of change and, in partnership with the synagogues, schools and other community organizations, to initiate a renaissance of Jewish awareness and observance; to improve the vaad's financial viability; to ensure that existing WK licensees were able to continue to provide their services and products to the community; to improve the availability of kosher services; and to raise the standards of kashrut supervision."

The new hechsher was to be supervised by a trio of Orthodox rabbis.

Yet the creation of MBK encountered opposition and concern right from the beginning. Conservative synagogues and some members of the Vaad Ha'ir's board were upset because they were not consulted about the changes or even informed that discussions were taking place. The Conservative synagogues were content with WK and the status quo and concerned that the change to MBK would have adverse effects on their ability to provide for weddings, bar mitzvahs and other events where food is served.

MBK also quickly faced financial pressures. The old vaad, functioning with a part-time executive director and one full-time employee had been able to subsist despite a declining revenue base in recent years. The new vaad hired a new full time executive director with hopes of having WK licensees switch over quickly to MBK at higher fees and being able to sign up enough new licensees to add to its revenues.

"In hindsight, we should have concentrated first on education, fundraising, consultation and listening," Aronovitch said.

It turned out that the key WK licensees were not willing to switch over to MBK. That left MBK in a financial hole. In September and again in December, the vaad had to appeal to the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg for loans to pay the bills.

The initial plan was for WK to be phased out over a few months while licensees moved under the MBK banner. As a result of the difficulties that MBK has encountered, the plans have been changed dramatically. WK will now continue to operate as it was. MBK will also be maintained on a smaller scale as a separate operation.

In the meantime, the Vaad Ha'ir will try to raise the money to establish a Kashrut Preservation Trust Fund over the next few years. The interest from the fund would be used to cover operating deficits while the vaad tries to increase its licensee base.

The money would also be available to WK licensees who want to upgrade their plants and convert to MBK.

McGill gets teacher training gift

By JANICE ARNOLD

MONTREAL — A million-dollar gift to McGill University from Leanor Segal will be used to enhance the training of teachers for Jewish schools.

The Jewish studies department is recognizing its benefactor by creating the Leanor Segal Chair in Jewish Studies, which will pave the way for the future McGill University Institute for Jewish Education. The institute plans to provide Jewish teacher training and research into Jewish education at a more advanced level than is now available.

Jewish studies chair Gershon Hundert said the endowment in Jewish education established by Leanor Segal will be the "cornerstone" of the institute, which has been proposed to the university administration.

McGill has had a Jewish teacher training program since 1973, but it has weathered financial problems over the past decade. Its value has, however, never been in question, Hundert said.

The program has graduated close to 200 students over its history, said its director Eric Caplan, and virtually all of them have found employment in their profession and can be found today throughout Canada and the United States.

The McGill graduates are particularly coveted because the program is one of the few on the continent that leads to a BEd and certification to teach Jewish and general studies at either the elementary or the high school level.

In Canada, Toronto's York University has the only other Jewish teacher training program, and its emphasis is on elementary school.

Mideast peace process explored

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — On the eve of Israel's election Feb. 5, a crowd of demonstrators gathered quietly outside Temple Sholom holding candles and placards reading, "No To Israeli Occupation."

The protesters were attempting to gain the attention of speakers and people attending a community evening called Is There Peace at the End of the Process?

Stephen Aberle, Jews for a Just Peace spokesperson, said the approximately 30 activists were on the street to show encouragement for peace with justice for both Israelis and Palestinians.

"It's a coalition demonstration between Jews for a Just Peace and the Canada Palestine Support Network in support of an end to Israeli occupation in Gaza," Aberle said.

Inside, Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon and Canada-Israel Committee executive director Robert Ritter addressed a 400-member audience about the prospect of peace in Israel.

When cellular phones intermittently rang during the Israeli ambassador's speech, Divon was gracious and humorous about the interruptions. When the second phone sounded, Divon reached into his pocket, pulled out his own non-ringing cell phone, and said, "Is it mine? Is it me?" The audience roared with laughter.

But that would be the evening's last laugh. The audience quickly quieted down as Divon spoke of how Israelis are tired of war and would like to see an end to the region's conflict, and how each and every citizen wants to live a normal life in a normal society as we do in Canada.

"We are interested in a peace process, but if we are not getting in return security and a sense of legitimacy, then we have to think it over," Divon said. "We will not compromise the security of the State of Israel."

Stating that any dialogue or peace negotiations between Israel's prime minister and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat won't be easy, he said the process is continually made more difficult by Arafat's use of violence and terror.

Ritter echoed Divon's sentiments. Critical of the international community's role in condemning Israel in the past months' violent and deadly eruptions, he said disruptions in the peace process made Israeli citizens and world Jewry hope and pray for the best but prepare for the worst.

"It's difficult dealing with a man like Arafat... is he trustworthy? Does he really want peace? He's broken every commitment made in Oslo and yet no one questions his broken commitments," Ritter said. "The road ahead is uncertain and perilous, but our ideals are just and our cause is just and in the end, truth will prevail."

The Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver organized the event.

Pro-active approach to Israel urged

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As the votes were being tallied and Ariel Sharon cruised to an easy victory last Tuesday, McGill University history professor Gil Troy refused to predict whether Israel's new prime minister would make war or peace.

But regardless, Troy exhorted the Jewish community to get its act together and be more pro-active about Israel not only in bad times, but in good.

Troy, speaking at the closing session of staff development day held at FEDERATION CJA's Gelber Conference Centre, said the Jewish community, both here and in the Diaspora, has failed to forge a "solid friendship" with Israel since it is only by its side in times of crisis, such as the four-month-old Palestinian uprising.

Already into the 'down times'

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Some of the names may have changed and the numbers shifted some, but after observing the early days of the first session of the 37th Parliament, a depressing sense that very little has changed begins to set in.

The Liberal front bench has shown remarkable arrogance for a government that offered little inspiration in the Throne Speech. The Liberal backbenchers continue to moan and groan about their irrelevance to the political process. The Martinites and Rocksters are less than jubilant in reaction to the apparently re-invigorated prime minister, and all of this is just on the government side of the House.

Meanwhile, the Alliance has to come to terms with another icon "gone establishment" (Deborah Grey capitulates on MP pension plan) and Stockwell Day feels like he has a lead role in the CA... the Canadian Alamo! He has been reeling since the election campaign and has simply not been given a chance to establish himself as a credible leader. Before you express undue sympathy for him, consider that most true leaders carve out the title in the face of adversity rather than patiently wait for it to be presented to them on a gilded platter.

The Bloc is still in (understandable) shock following the loss of the separatists' only trump card, Lucien Bouchard, and the two "just-made-the-threshold-to-qualify-for-party- status" caucuses are mostly busy dealing with internal crises of one sort or another.

All of these circumstances could move one to conclude that there is little use in pursuing one's agenda on the Hill. Such a conclusion would be wrong and one hopes that the Jewish community has the foresight to sow its seeds now so that it may reap its rewards later.

Each group identified above, and all for their own reasons, will respond well to attention. The Liberal elite, as much as they feel the Jewish community may have betrayed them, require constant reassurance that they are loved and needed. The other Liberal factions are feeling quite vulnerable and some attention will touch a responsive and grateful chord. And, in like fashion, the Opposition parties need somebody to fuel their hopes of relevance at some point in the future.

Every politician expects attention in the lead-up to an election. But the smart money is on offering that attention during the "down times." Believe your faithful scribe: politicians are now experiencing the beginning of the "down times." Carpe diem.

Leading Canadian architect to design Calgary synagogue

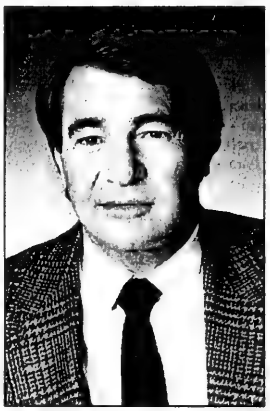
By MAXINE FISCHBEIN
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Temple B'nai Tikvah has chosen Canadian architect Jack Diamond to design a new home for the congregation.

Diamond was recently the recipient of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada's 2001 gold medal, Canada's highest architectural honour.

"He's a very accomplished architect, internationally recognized," said temple member Howard Bell, a former president and current member of the temple's building steering committee.

Some of Diamond's projects have included Jerusalem's City Hall and City Square, and Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care where he worked closely with the clinical psychology department to "set a new benchmark for architectural aspects addressing the needs of the aged and cognitively impaired," said Bell.



Jack Diamond

Diamond said that three constituencies had to be satisfied in designing Baycrest – the residents, the caregivers, and the relatives and friends who "would visit their loved ones more often, if they felt comfortable going there."

Toward that end, said Diamond, he created an institution with a non-institutional feel.

He is currently building a new Jewish community centre in New York, having beaten out 46 New York firms to win the contract.

This is the first time Diamond has designed a place of worship.

In hiring Diamond, Bell said, the Calgary congregation took the advice of Sidney Aisenstadt, a consultant with the Union of American Hebrew Congregations – the umbrella organization of the Reform movement. He advised the temple to get "a top-notch architect and set your sights high," said Bell.

The temple's building committee compiled a list of 20 potential firms, which included Diamond, and Israeli-born architect Moshe Safdie.

Safdie expressed interest in the project but dropped out of the competition "with regret, because he did not have a suitable local partner.

"Jack Diamond impressed us the most with his incredible knowledge. He had a true sense of Jewish history, something we really wanted to express in the building," said Bell.

Diamond, born and raised in South Africa, is the descendent of a long line of rabbis dating back to 1720. Rabbi Abba Werner, Diamond's great-grandfather, once served as the chief rabbi of London.

Diamond said the project was attractive to him "because of the members. The shul's building committee is an extremely intelligent and open-minded group who were not in the market for just another synagogue.

"The congregation has a sense of itself," said Diamond, "a sense that is reflected in the design plans for the congregation's new home," which will be situated on the Patterson Lands, adjacent to the Calgary Jewish Centre.

Synagogue leaders are keeping the details of the design under tight wraps until the plans are rolled out for B'nai Tikvah members at the shul's annual general meeting in June.

Diamond took on a small project such as B'nai Tikvah, he said, because "it is not small in terms of design issues."

He is motivated, he said, by the seriousness of his temple clients. "I like them a lot. They are open and considerate, addressing profound issues from first principles."

Unity talks launch second round

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Days after his landslide victory, Israeli Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon is pressing ahead with efforts to form a national unity government that could advance peace efforts.

The Likud and Labour parties launched a second round of coalition talks Sunday, but it remained unclear if the two parties would be able to overcome ideological differences and form a unity government.

Representatives from each side signaled cautious optimism as they met at a Jerusalem hotel to discuss the unity proposal.

Cabinet minister Shimon Peres, who is not part of the Labour negotiating team, applauded Sharon's offer that Labour choose two out of the three senior portfolios – defence, foreign affairs and finance.

"The Likud proposal that we take two of the three most central portfolios is very serious," said Peres, who favours a national unity government.

Asked by Israel Radio what portfolio he would consider for himself, Peres responded, "only foreign affairs."

The presence of Nobel Peace Prize laureate Peres in his cabinet would provide Sharon with much-needed credibility for his political agenda when it comes to dealing with cautious western governments and hostile Arab regimes.

Sharon offered the defence portfolio to outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak when they met last Friday, but sources close to Barak said he will probably decline.

Just the same, the two met again on Sunday for what was described as a "political-security" update.

The unity talks could be hampered by the succession battle within Labour following Barak's decision to resign as party leader, and because of mounting tensions between Barak and Peres over who will set the tone for the coalition negotiations. Barak has demanded that he be solely responsible for Labour's delegation.

Labour negotiators have several points they want met before joining a unity government:

- a commitment from Sharon not to build new settlements;
- agreement to the establishment of a demilitarized Palestinian state; and
- transfer of isolated Jewish settlements into larger settlement blocs.

Reuven Rivlin, a Likud official, said Sharon will not agree to dismantle any of the 144 Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"God forbid that we should say that a Jew who has been brought there on a mission for all of us, and with full Zionist intentions, should be evacuated," Rivlin told Israel Radio.

Sharon has yet to provide a detailed outline of his vision for Middle East peace efforts.

But in an interview with the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot last Friday, he said he preferred to pursue an extended non-belligerency agreement with the Palestinians instead of a final peace accord.

Sharon also reiterated that he does not intend to negotiate with the Palestinians as long as violence continues.

On Sunday, an Israeli driver on a main road linking Jerusalem to the Etzion Bloc of West Bank settlements was killed when he was shot in the head by gunmen in Beit Jalla, a Palestinian town next to Bethlehem. Israeli ambulance workers who came to the man's aid also came under fire.

In addition, on Sunday evening, Palestinians fired at the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo for the first time in nearly a month. Soldiers guarding Rachel's Tomb in the Bethlehem area also came under fire from Palestinian gunmen in a nearby refugee camp.

Israel under pressure to release funds to PA

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Israel is facing increasing international pressure to relieve the economic distress of the Palestinian Authority (PA) and resume paying tax revenues frozen since the start of the latest intifadah.

The United States and Norway urged Israel last week to resume the payments, arguing that this will be in Israel's security interests.

"It's dire. Life is very difficult for people [in the PA]," U.S. State Department spokesperson Richard Boucher said after U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell met with Norway's foreign minister, Thorbjoern Jagland.

"So we've been urging the Israeli government to transfer tax revenues to the Palestinian Authority… because we recognize the interplay between the economic and political environments," Boucher said.

His comment marked a relatively rare U.S. public criticism of Israel.

"We all recognize that Israel does have certain security concerns," Boucher said. "The Palestinians need to do everything they can to end the violence. But at the same time, we've been very concerned about the economic situation of the Palestinians."

Jagland said Powell understood the urgency of the situation, Boucher reported. "There is a very difficult situation in the Palestinian Authority. They are nearly collapsing."

Palestinian health workers, police and other key people were not being paid because of the suspension, Boucher said.

A State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Powell would raise the issue with Israel when he visits the Middle East later this month.

"Word from the territories is that it's reaching the economic breaking point," the official said. "Israelis need to have their security concerns addressed, but there are ways to do it without putting an economic burden on families. It's counterproductive to what the Israelis are trying to achieve," he added.

U.S. ambassador to Israel Martin Indyk met last Thursday evening with outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak, and Friday with Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon. He said the PA could collapse within three months if the current situation continues. The PA owes $50 million to its public workers, but has no money to pay them.

An American source said yesterday that Hamas is recruiting PA security men who have not received their wages.

UN Middle East envoy Terje Larsen met with Sharon and with Barak's political security adviser, Danny Yatom. He asked Israel to pay the money it owes the PA. Yatom promised to look into the matter.

Sharon told Indyk and Larsen he is willing to ease restrictions on the Palestinians, and that he opposes collective punishment on principle. But he demanded the Palestinians end the terror and shooting, "because it's impossible to negotiate like that."

Larsen said PA Chairman Yasser Arafat is losing control, to which Sharon replied: "Then he must take action quickly. We have no interest in anarchy. I decided to take action toward peace, but that obligates the other side to fulfil its duties."

Israel rejects Mitchell request for more info

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has refused a U.S. request for clarifications regarding IDF assassinations of Palestinian militants over the last few months, saying that it is not a human rights issue.

The U.S. State Department gave the Foreign Ministry a list of slain Palestinians and asked for detailed explanations of each case, as part of its preparation of an annual report on human rights, to be published this month.

But the Foreign Ministry's official response was that the assassinations, like Israel's other military responses, must be seen in the context of the armed conflict that has been raging in the territories for more than four months, and not as a human rights issue. Israel will therefore not give the State Department detailed information on these cases, though it will, as always, give the department detailed information about a variety of other human rights issues in Israel.

Israeli government officials are concerned the State Department report will sharply criticize both the liquidations and other actions Israel has taken against the Palestinians, such as the closure of the territories.

Meanwhile, Israel has proposed that an international fact-finding committee on the violence in the territories postpone a visit scheduled for Feb. 16 because of the change in governments in Jerusalem.

Foreign Ministry director-general Alon Liel explained to deputy U.S. ambassador Paul Simons that Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon will probably still be busy setting up a coalition on that date, and will therefore have no formal authority, while a meeting with outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak would be valueless. And it would be "undignified" for the Mitchell committee, all of whose members are senior statesmen, to meet merely with lower-level officials, Liel said.

A senior government source said that because the committee already postponed a visit once at Israel's request, Jerusalem has not officially requested a postponement this time. However, the government is hoping that the committee will draw its own conclusions from the political situation.

Israeli officials are still divided over whether to resume cooperation with the committee, which was suspended after the head of its technical team, Larry Pope, visited the Temple Mount without Israel's consent. Pope has since been dismissed from his post.

The media's inconsistencies

According to Reports

Many Canadians, including some journalists, are struggling to maintain a balanced and consistent understanding of the overwhelming election results in Israel. What do these results mean and why did they occur?

For instance, just six days before Israelis elected Ariel Sharon prime minister, the Toronto Star observed in its editorial that "Ehud Barak has offered the Palestinian more than any previous leader. Yet Arafat vilified him... at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, denouncing Barak's 'savage and barbaric war' against Palestinians... Arafat's timing was bizarre... [his] wild outburst made no sense... [Barak] deserved better."

Indeed, Barak and all Israelis deserved better. So, too, did the Palestinians themselves, whose hopes for a better future were most certainly undermined by their intransigent leader.

However, immediately after Sharon's election, the Star was considerably less understanding and consistent, reporting that "Israelis lashed out in frustration... repudiating Ehud Barak's peace efforts..."

Yet this was not so. Israelis, more than anything, were repudiating Arafat's rejectionism, as the Star seemed to understand just days before. The newspaper even acknowledges that two-thirds of Israelis "don't want to give up on the Mideast peace process." Yet it reports, "Given the violence of the past few months, Israelis were not persuaded that Yasser Arafat and the Palestinians were trustworthy partners."

To say Israelis were not "persuaded" is a gross understatement.

William Thorsell, former editor-in-chief of the Globe and Mail, put it perfectly in his Globe column of Feb. 2: "Yasser Arafat is another example of 'a man who just can't say yes,' whatever the logical calculation of his interest."

Referring to Arafat's Davos outburst, Thorsell said it was "neither an accident nor an indiscretion; it was a pathology."

Israelis sense this pathology only too well, which explains why they voted for a man they feel will deal accordingly with it, and at the same time, still pursue the path of peace they all yearn for.

Many journalists do understand the extent of Arafat's betrayal and the dilemma Israelis face. Some others also vaguely perceive this, but in an inconsistent and impatient manner that unfairly places the burden on Israel.

New conditions for Arafat

In Israel, the argument over Arafat's ability to stop the violence still continues. If he is not able to do this, the question arises as to whether he is the right partner for serious negotiations, or whether he is now only a Palestinian national symbol.

IDF intelligence has unequivocally determined that the violence in the territories is carried out under Arafat's strategic direction. What is more, the official Palestinian security agencies under Arafat's command now provide backing and assistance to most of the violent activity.

If this is indeed the situation, then instructions must be given to Israel's representatives in the United States to try to convince Congress to consider placing Arafat and Fatah back on the list of bodies that support terror.

Iran, Hezbollah, Hamas and several other terrorist-oriented organizations already appear on this list; co-operative relationships are being developed between several of them and the Palestinian Authority (PA).

The latest instance is the shooting at the settlement of Netzarim launched from the Gaza Strip by Hezbollah, using an improvised 82-millimetre mortar. This is a grave precedent, but there are several other examples of militant activity by Hezbollah.

At the village of Abu Sinan in the Galilee, Hezbollah recently tried to encourage Israeli Arabs to kidnap soldiers; and the extraction from Israel of Elhanan Tannenbaum, who was kidnapped and transferred to Lebanon, was carried out in a Hezbollah "sting" operation involving Israeli Arabs.

In recent weeks, most of the violent incidents, in which passing motorists or civilians on their way to business transactions with Palestinians were killed, can be traced to Fatah, the Tanzim militia or one of the various security organizations of the PA.

The shooting at the bus near Jericho was carried out by the Force 17 militia, which is also responsible for killing an Israeli soldier and officer in the same region.

The Tanzim killed Etgar Zeitani and Motti Dayan in Tul Karm two weeks ago. The detonating wires of the two explosive charges discovered recently near the Netzarim Junction led straight to a position within the Palestinian security zone.

These are just a few examples from a long list. If Arafat is neither capable nor desirous of calling a halt to these actions, then the rules of the game, as far as they relate to Israel's dialogue with him, must change on both the diplomatic and the military fronts.

Arab states freeze millions of dollars in aid to Palestinians

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Arab countries have suspended the transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars collected in recent months for the Palestinian people for fear the money will end up in the wrong pockets, exacerbating the already rampant corruption in the Palestinian Authority, Israeli security sources told Ha'aretz.

Arab states decided at an October conference in Cairo to transfer some $1 billion to the PA to alleviate the Palestinians' suffering caused by Israel's clampdown on them due to the violence of the intifadah.

However, not all the money was sent, and the PA has accused the Arab leaders of being indifferent to the Palestinians' plight. The Arab aid to the PA was to come in the form of humanitarian consignments of food and drugs and to be transferred via the border crossings with Israel.

It now appears that a considerable sum was, in fact, raised, but not sent to the PA. Sources told Ha'aretz about $230 million was raised – a large proportion in Saudi Arabia and the Persian Gulf states. The contributing Arab countries and the banks through which the money was to move demanded that Chairman Yasser Arafat show complete transparency in the funds transfers and give a detailed report on how it was spent. This Arab demand followed past experience with money sent to Arafat's regime.

A great deal of money sent to the PA, especially from Europe, the United States and Japan, after its establishment, did not reach its intended destination. Through the collection of arbitration fees, monopolies and numerous other schemes, a large proportion of that money ended up in the bank accounts of PA officials, including Arafat himself and his economic advisor, Muhammad Rashid.

Because the PA has evaded the current demands made by the Arab donors, the money – most of which is being held in the Islamic Bank in the Persian Gulf – has been frozen. Israel doubts the PA will accede to the Arab donor demands, because it wants control over the flow of money.

Barak tells Bush: Sharon is not bound by my concessions

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak has informed U.S. President George Bush that the concessions Barak made do not commit the incoming government of Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon.

Any negotiations involving Israel, the United States and the Palestinian Authority in the last year were based on the idea that "nothing is agreed until it is all agreed," Barak said.

He plans to reiterate the message to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and to European leaders.

Sharon, meanwhile, responded to Arafat's congratulatory message sent the day after the elections, saying in his letter to the Palestinian leader that "progress toward peace requires total abandonment of violence."

Barak spoke with former president Bill Clinton before writing the message to Bush, which said that Israel had made a "supreme effort" to put an end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but that the efforts did not bear fruit because the "Palestinian leadership" was not ready to make compromises.

Barak met with Sharon last Friday to brief the prime minister-elect on current diplomatic and security issues. In addition, Sharon was scheduled to meet with Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz, U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk and UN Middle East envoy Terja Larsen.

Sharon also spoke with Clinton and with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, who both asked him to do something to relieve the difficult economic situation in the Palestinian Authority.

Meanwhile, after seeming to deliberately ignore the Palestinian leader since taking office, Bush recently urged Arafat to work to stop the violence, Palestinian officials said. The phone call came just before the car bombing in Jerusalem.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell told Arafat in a phone call that the United States will continue its efforts to push the peace process forward, said Arafat aide Nabil Aburdeneh.

The United States is closely following the events in the region, including Sharon's election and the ongoing violence, Powell told Arafat.

Clinton called Barak and thanked him for his contributions to the peace process, Barak's office said. Clinton commended Barak for demonstrating courage, determination and historical insight during his term, Barak's office said in a statement. The two promised to meet in the near future.

Powell's call to Arafat was one of several he made to the region, in an effort to keep the region calm after the Sharon election victory. He spoke with Sharon, as Bush did, as well as to King Abdullah II of Jordan, Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia, Foreign Minister Amr Moussa of Egypt and Foreign Minister Farouk Shara of Syria.

"The message is basically... that we're at a delicate time, that the prime minister-elect will need to form a government, and that during this period we should avoid provocations, we should avoid counter-provocations and everyone should be exercising restraint and moderation," said State Department spokesperson Richard Boucher. "Also, that we need to work together and talk to our friends and allies in the region and talk to the new government once it's formed, about how we can proceed toward the search for peace."

Clinton also called Sharon, whose office reported afterward that Clinton said, "Maybe your tough stance not to negotiate under the gun will enable you to succeed."

Sharon representatives were expected to head to the United States, Europe, Moscow and Mexico, to present Sharon's positions to foreign governments, in the hope that the capitals will let Sharon proceed with his plans for the peace process.

אריק שרון

פינת שמחה

יש לי חבר שקוראים לו שמחה, וחוא שולח לי באינטרנט בדיחות שמביאות לי צחוק גם ברגעים קשים ביותר. לא את כולן אני יכול לספר בעיתון יחזדי מחוגן. מפעם לפעם אביא לכם את פינת שמחה, אבל שישאר בינינו.

האיטלקי אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אני מת לכוס יין.
חספרדי אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אני מת לסקוטש.
חרוסי אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אני מת לכוסית ודקה.
חגרמני אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אני מת לכוס בירח.
חיחזדי אומר: אני עייף וצמא, אוי ני, בטח יש לי סכרת.

Local band featured in CBS mini-series

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Local klezmer band Beyond the Pale was featured in CBS' drama Haven, filmed here last summer.

The mini-series, which aired Feb. 11 and 14, is based on Ruth Gruber's book which tells the true story of Gruber, then a U.S. government official, who persuaded Franklin Roosevelt to provide an aging Liberty ship to transport 1,000 Holocaust survivors from Italy to an internment camp in Oswego, N.Y.

The script called for a klezmer band among the refugees. Eric Stein, leader and mandolin player of Beyond the Pale, was consultant to the music supervisor as an expert on klezmer music.

"I was enlisted to organize a refugee klezmer band that was purported to have been among the refugees," Stein said.

Stein spoke to Gruber on the set about the authenticity of a klezmer band among the refugees.

"There were in fact musicians among the refugees, but in actuality, they did not play klezmer music," Stein said Gruber told him.

"That the history was altered in order to make the band a klezmer group is an interesting testament to the popularity of this music these days and also gives the film a little more Jewish soul."

Stein researched the appropriate music and assembled a band of musicians which featured bandmates Martin Van de Ven on clarinet and Sasha Luminsky on accordion plus Dan Golden on violin and Paul Neufeld on tuba.

All of them except Luminsky appeared in the film.

Haven starred Natasha Richardson as Gruber.

Beyond the Pale will be releasing a CD next month. Stein said the music they normally play is more progressive (yet rootsy) than the music they played in the film.

'Jewish' episode of Gunsmoke to be screened at the AGO

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

You all remember Gunsmoke, don't you? – the highly popular television adult western that run from 1955 to 1975.

The reason it lasted so long was that its storylines and characters were credible and reasonably intelligent.

In one episode, This Golden Land, aired in 1973, the plot turned on a Jewish family whose lives are suddenly disrupted by a bunch of ruffians on horseback.

This Golden Land, which deals with such timeless themes as tradition and vengeance, will be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on Sunday, Feb. 18 at 5:15 p.m. and again at 7:45 p.m. The venue is the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall.

Starring a boyish-looking actor named Richard Dreyfuss, who graduated to bigger and better roles, This Golden Land is set in Kansas around the late 19th century.

As the film opens, three cowboys riding hard on a dusty plain come upon Moshe Garofsky, an Orthodox Jew, and his three sons, Samul, Gershon (Dreyfuss) and Laibel. They are new immigrants from the "old country," presumably Russia.

Clad in prayer shawls and tfillin, the Garofskys are minding their own business. Yet the cowboys seem puzzled, if not irritated, by their very presence. "What are you, some kind of medicine men?" one of them asks archly in a perfect example of cultural dissonance.

They harass Samul, tying him up and dragging him brutally along the ground. The injuries he sustains are serious enough for him to be confined to bed.

The family calls a doctor, but Samul is too far gone for treatment. After he dies, the Garofskys rend their clothes and recite a Hebrew prayer.

When was the last time you ever saw these Jewish rituals in a mainstream western?

With Samul buried according to Jewish law, the question that remains to be settled is whether justice will prevail.

To Moshe, the issue is problematic because there is not sufficient direct evidence to convict the cowboys of murder.

Guided by his interpretation of the Talmud, he believes that a man cannot be accused of a crime if the evidence is merely circumstantial.

Marshal Matt Dillon (James Arness) contends that Moshe is "playing with words." But Moshe, citing the Talmud, stands his ground. "We will obey the law," he declares defiantly.

Gershon, however, sharply disagrees with his father. In true Old West fashion, he seeks revenge. Laibel urges him to hold off, but Gershon's mother, a demure shawl around her shoulders, empathizes with her headstrong son.

We ought to live in peace and walk in dignity in this new land, she says, as Gershon rides off into the sunset to confront his brother's killers.

The denouement of This Golden Land, far from panning out as one might think, surprises a viewer with a nifty twist.

Suffice it to say that justice is done, in more than the biblical sense of the word.

Star of CBC show Our Hero to perform in play at Toronto's Bluma Appel theatre

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Couch potatoes and theatregoers alike can enjoy actress Cara Pifko's work, both on stage and on TV.

Pifko stars in the new, critically praised, youth-oriented, CBC television series Our Hero, seen on Thursdays at 7:30 p.m. Our Hero is a tragicomedy about growing up.

And from March 19 to April 14, Pifko will be performing in her third production for Canadian Stage, portraying Juliet in Goodnight Desdemona (Good Morning Juliet) at Toronto's Bluma Appel Theatre in the St. Lawrence Centre for the Performing Arts.

"I love film and theatre. Before Our Hero, I wouldn't have said I liked television, but now, having been in a project as well written and well crafted as Our Hero, I would be very pleased to go on with this show."

In Our Hero, Pifko plays Kale Stiglic, a naive but confident 17-year-old, trying to figure things out on her way through life.

Stiglic writes a zine, an underground magazine, which she hands out to her schoolmates and fellow zine writers. Her publication is a diary about her private life, written solely to get back at her dad, a humour columnist who is always taking pot shots at her in print.

The show cleverly uses animation to tell Stiglic's zine's point of view.

Goodnight Desdemona is a play written by Ann Marie MacDonald, who plays the part of Constance, a slightly crazy teaching assistant who has been writing a thesis about Shakespeare's Othello and Romeo and Juliet.

"Constance hits her head on the side of her desk and falls into her garbage can and into the world of these two plays. While trying to solve her thesis, she mixes up both plays and comedy ensues," Pifko says.

"My character, Juliet, falls in love with Constance because she is dressed like a man. It is very complicated," Pifko explains.

The Toronto-born actress and graduate of Montreal's National Theatre School began her career when she was three years old, singing on Sharon, Lois and Bram records.

At the age of seven, she began a five-year run on the trio's television series The Elephant Show.

"I was enjoying acting, but didn't know until Grade 11 that this was what I really wanted to do. In Grade 12, I got my first agent and was in a couple of commercials, one for IDA, the pharmacy, and one for the Ontario Ministry of Youth."

As an adult, she had a recurring role in Road to Avonlea and co-hosted Pumped on TSN, now seen in reruns on TVOntario.

Currently, she's the voice of Josephine Praline on the animated television series Angela Anaconda. Her feature film credits are Marietta in Ecstasy and Ordinary Magic. In the upcoming mini-series Me and My Shadow, Pifko will be playing Judy Garland's sister Jimmy Gumm.

Her past theatre credits at CanStage are How I Learned To Drive and Les Belles Soeurs.

"I felt very lucky to do my first play, How I Learned To Drive, at Canadian Stage, because I worked with [some top actors]. I couldn't have asked for a better first experience on the stage. It was a lucky stroke, I learned so much right away and I was straight out of school. It is one of the projects that I'll cherish forever," she says.

For tickets to Goodnight Desdemona (Good Morning Juliet), contact the CanStage Box Office at 416-368-3110.

Chelm animation wins Genie Award

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Village of Idiots, based on the Jewish folk tales about the legendary shtetl of Chelm, won the award for best animated short film at the 21st anniversary Genie Awards ceremony held here recently.

The Genie Awards are presented by the Academy of Canadian Cinema and Television to honour outstanding achievement in the Canadian film industry.

Village of Idiots follows the misadventures of Shmendrik as he leaves Chelm in search of the wider world, only to wind up in a village that seems to be suspiciously similar to his home town. Not only does the village appear identical, but even the people populating the village seem to be the same as the people he just left behind.

Some readers may have seen Village of Idiots at last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, where it received a terrific response.

Directed by Eugene Fedorenko and Rose Newlove and produced by Michael Scott and David Verrall, Village of Idiots was filmed using paper cutouts placed on layers of glass. The results are a unique form of animation and are wonderful to watch.

Village of Idiots uses the vocal talents of local actors Hindy Nosek-Abelson, Jack Newman, Yank Azman and Gilda Block.

The National Film Board is currently distributing the film. You can order it by calling 1-800-267-7710 or going to the NFB's Web site at www.nfb.ca/homevideo. At just under 13 minutes long, it is available for $12.95.

BLOOR JCC HOSTS EVENING OF NEW WRITING

Writer and zine editor Hal Niedzviecki is host of a New Voices: An Evening of Innovative Readings, coming up soon at the Bloor JCC. Like most of the others on the program, Niedzviecki – editor of Broken Pencil magazine and author of the novel, Lurvy, and a book of short stories, Smell It – is young, talented, and already making a name for himself in the world of Canadian letters.

The evening features readings by Jay Brodbar, Jonathan Garfinkel, Anita Shir-Jacob, Gideon Forman, Adam Sol and Karen Shenfeld.

"There are so many good writers out there," says event organizer Frances Enchin. "I would like them to have an opportunity to read. It will also give us all the chance to see some of the amazing talent we have here in Toronto."

Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor. Thursday, Feb. 22, 7:30 p.m. Members free, non-members $5. Cash bar. 416-924-6211.

Cantorial Concert: Shaarei Shomayim Congregation recently began selling tickets for "an unforgettable evening of Broadway, cantorial, chassidic & operatic music." The four chazzans, Yaakov Motzen, Avi Albrecht, Benjamin Warschawski and Shlomo Simcha Sufrin, share the stage with the Shaarei Shomayim Choir and pianist Cantor Daniel Gildar.

470 Glencairn Ave. May 22. $50, $36 and $20. 7:45 p.m. 416-789-3213.

Choral Music: Leonard Bernstein called his Chichester Psalms "perhaps the most tonal score I've ever written." He wrote it in 1965 at a time when many modern composers considered conventional tonality as outmoded. The Toronto Mendelssohn Youth Choir and the Elora Festival Singers are preparing to sing the Hebrew lyrics of this piece at Songs for the Soul, an upcoming concert that also features a performance of Mozart's Vespers (1780).

St. Clement's Anglican Church, 59 Briar Hill Ave. Saturday, March 3, 8 p.m. $25. 416-598-0422.

Lilith and Woman* by Lilian Broca, 1999, graphite and spackle on panel.

Song of Lilith: The multi-media concert, A Song of Lilith, which combines the disciplines of music, poetry, visual art and theatre, has been called a "feminist Paradise Lost."

The work, which made its debut in Toronto in September, is a collaboration among composer Larysa Kuzmenko, author Joy Kogawa, visual artist Lilian Broca, actor Barbara Gordon and five musicians. Focusing on the Biblical legend of Adam's diabolical first wife, A Song of Lilith comes to the Norman Rothstein Theatre, Vancouver JCC, Sunday, March 18, 8 p.m. $25. 604-257-5111.

A book combining Kogawa's poem and Broca's art has been published by Raincoast. It is titled A Song of Lilith and costs $21.95. A retrospective exhibition of Broca's art is currently on view at Seattle's Frye Art Museum (to March 4).

What's Doing in Winnipeg: The Chai Folk Ensemble, North America's oldest and largest Israeli folk dance group, performs its annual concert in Winnipeg, Tuesday, Feb. 20, 8 p.m. at the Centennial Concert Hall.

The ensemble consists of more than 40 dancers, singers and musicians. Its show is called Chai 2001: Gate of Jerusalem. In the first half, Chai focuses on pieces representative of Jewish Moroccans, Russians, Ethiopians and Middle Eastern communities that have returned to Israel.

The opening piece, choreographed by Shai Gottesman, explores the emotions of passing through the Gates of Jerusalem. Later, the piece titled Ethiopian tells the story of Operations Moses, Joshua and Solomon, which facilitated the historic return of thousands of Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

In the second part of the program, Hashirim Hamishchakim focuses on traditional children's play songs. Choreographed by Alberto Zirlinger, the number involves over 80 children on stage.

"With the media pictures of violence and stone-throwing, we thought it was important to show what these children really should be doing in their young lives," said Tracy Kasner, co-artistic director of Chai. "There is an innocence and simple beauty to children's games that can stand against the violence."

Adults $20. 204-780-3333.

OLD JEWISH POSTCARDS COMING TO SPERTUS MUSEUM

A craze for postcards ensued after they were introduced for a penny apiece at the Chicago Exposition of 1898. For the next few decades, many colourful postcards on Jewish themes were produced, both in the United States and in Europe. Today they are much-sought-after collectors' items.

Many show sentimental or romanticized tableaus of Jewish life in the Old Country. Religious scenes, Jewish immigration to America or Palestine, and scenes of modern travel via bicycle, airplane, automobile or motorcycle were also common.

The Spertus Museum in Chicago is readying a display of some 100 postcards from the Jewish Theological Seminary of New York, and supplementing the collection with roughly 400 more postcards from various private sources.

Past Perfect: The Jewish Experience in Early 20th Century Postcards runs March 11 to Aug. 26, 618 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago. www.spertus.edu.

Kosher Cruises: Possessing "the only separate kosher galley at sea," Florida-based Orient Lines is offering eight cruise vacations aboard their deluxe ships Marco Polo and Crown Odyssey. Destinations include Norway, Scandinavia and Russia, the Aegean and the Mediterranean, and Venice and the Greek Isles. Departures begin in early June and run through October.

The 15-day Midnight Sun cruise, which traverses the fiords of Norway and sails beyond the Arctic Circle to the remote Lofoten Isles and the North Cape, is timed to coincide with the summer solstice (departs June 17). This cruise features a festival of Jewish music, with cantorial recitals by Benzion Miller of Borough Park and Daniel Gildar of Philadelphia. Rates begin at $2,995 (US).

Included with all cruises are kosher meals, on-board entertainment, daily minyan, lectures on various Jewish topics, specialized tours at select ports of call, and much more. Many packages also offer visits to areas of Jewish historical significance and meetings with local Jewish communities. Kashrut is supervised by Rabbi Shmuel Weiss, ordained at the Hebrew Theological College in Skokie and certified by the Rabbinate of the State of Israel.

Passover Possibilities: An American company, Resort Classics, is marketing five top-end luxury resorts that provide programs for Passover. The Park City Marriott, about 30 minutes from Salt Lake City, Utah, is for skiing enthusiasts.

The others are in warm-weather locations. They are: The Hyatt Regency Waikiki, an oceanfront property with a fitness and wellness centre, a spectacular tropical atrium and two large pools; the Grenelefe Golf and Tennis Resort and Spa of Orlando, which is near Disney World, Epcot Center, Universal Studio and other attractions; Coronado Island Marriott Resort and Spa, across the bay from San Diego; and the Ritz-Carlton Palm Beach Resort and Spa of South Florida, a spectacular beach property that has been rated America's top resort by Conde Nast.

Internet Travel: Armchair travellers or those planning a vacation to Israel or other "Jewish" destinations will find plenty of options and information at the Web site, www.jewishroutes.com. This sophisticated U.K.-based site takes longer than most to load up, but once it does, it delivers many intriguing possibilities.

Jewishroutes lists more than 1,000 vegetarian restaurants worldwide, 50 Passover resorts, Jewish heritage tours, kosher cruises, singles tours, solidarity tours, student travel, kosher skiing and, of course, many ways of exploring Israel. There are also sections on food and wine, accommodation, culture and religious facilities. As well, the site offers a currency converter and a list of Shabbat candlelighting times.

For a detailed list of times of sunrise, sunset, candlelighting and Havdalah, visit Orthodox Union's site at www.ou.org/zmanim/zmanim.htm. Its search engine allows one to search by city in some 36 countries. The OU's home page is www.ou.org.

Passover in Los Angeles: The University of Judaism in the Bel Air neighbourhood of Los Angeles is hosting a Passover session for people at or above the traditional age of retirement. The adventure includes two full seders, excursions to the Getty Center, Skirball Cultural Center, Huntington Library and the Museum of Tolerance, as well as three meals and two lectures daily.

April 5 to 16. $1,999 (US) per person, double occupancy. Limited enrolment. Details, www.seniorsummerschool.com or 954-917-9590.

Cruise News: The Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported last week that the cruise ship Millennium has cancelled its port calls to Haifa in favour of calls at Alexandria, Egypt. Celebrity Cruises, which operates the ship, said the change was made in response to passenger fears about violence in the region. Seabourn, a cruise line run by Carnival Cruises, has also cancelled port calls at Haifa. Travellers seeking an eastern Mediterranean cruise with an Israeli port-of-call are therefore advised to look elsewhere.

Support essential when dealing with cancer

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There is no single word that strikes such fear as "cancer," Dr. Yoel Abells, a family physician, says.

Abells, who was speaking at a recent panel on Coping with Cancer, talked about the need for compassion in the medical profession and the importance of creating a "natural" atmosphere.

"It's crucial for the people close to the cancer patient to be honest about how they feel," he said.

The event, held at Holy Blossom Temple, was sponsored by the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, a support group for people suffering from illness or emotional distress. The project is not affiliated with any particular stream of Judaism, and is available to all, free of charge.

The panel – including Abells; Dr. Mary Vachon, a psychotherapist, consultant and cancer survivor; Jerome Diamond, a social worker and former head of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF & CS); and moderator Rabbi John Moscowitz of Holy Blossom – spoke to an audience of approximately 50 cancer survivors, their families, doctors, nurses and health-care workers.

The panellists addressed how we, as friends, families, and more importantly, as Jews, can more ably cope with the news that a loved one has been diagnosed with the disease.

After years of counselling others on death and the grieving process, Vachon started feeling pains in her abdomen and feet. Soon after, she was diagnosed with lymphoma.

The experience changed her life, she said. Prayer and spirituality became part of her daily routine. Now, nearly four years after she completed her chemotherapy, Vachon remains cancer-free.

She's discovered that community plays a major role in the healing process.

"People who are linked with others simply do better," she said. "There have been a number of studies showing that people who attend church, synagogue or other holy places tend to live longer."

Diamond, who lost his wife of 34 years after her nine-year battle with the disease, felt relieved when he discovered how to "pray without being ashamed of needing to pray." After a lifetime of tending to other peoples' needs in the course of his work, he "had to come in as a beginner" and re-learn how to hold, how to touch, how to be with his ailing wife.

Diamond recalled Sheila's last years as "the best years" because the two became closer than ever, taking ballroom dance and Tai Chi classes – anything to ease her pain and to spend quality time together.

This, in essence, is why the Toronto Jewish Healing Project was created more than six years ago, said co-ordinator Etta Ginsberg McEwan.

Through "sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, music, ritual and stories," the project seeks to ease the pain of those suffering, both physically and emotionally, offering healing groups to those in need (the next one is set to begin April 16 for six weeks).

Ginsberg McEwan, the former director of social work at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, is the guiding force behind the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, which is funded mainly by the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, and some minor donations.

If you would like more information, or to volunteer, call Etta Ginsberg McEwan at 416-944-3359.

Study examines seniors' services

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the faculty of social work at the University of Toronto have joined forces to advance knowledge about social service programs that address the needs of an aging Canadian population.

Baycrest and the university have appointed Elsa Marziali, a U of T social work professor with an international reputation as a clinical researcher and educator, as Canada's first research chair in gerontological social work. Marziali is the recipient of the Norman and Honey Schipper chair in gerontological social work, a three-year appointment.

Marziali will set the direction for the Ben and Hilda Katz Centre in Gerontological Social Work, which was established at Baycrest and the faculty of social work at U of T in 1996, thanks to a gift from longtime Baycrest supporters, the late Ben and Hilda Katz.

The Katz Centre is unique in Canada because it is based in a multi-service practice setting and has a strong focus on clinical research. U of T's faculty of social work is recognized as one of North America's leaders in education and research in the field.

In collaboration with the social workers at Baycrest, Marziali has begun a research process which will evaluate the effectiveness of social work programs provided for clients and their families. The data generated from such research will contribute to the development of specialist training programs in gerontological social work and will help shape health policies for seniors across the country.

For the immediate future, Marziali's vision for the Ben and Hilda Katz Centre is twofold: to build a strong clinical research program in the social work department at Baycrest, and to develop a post-graduate specialist training program in gerontological social work practice and research.

Established with a gift from Toronto philanthropists Joseph and Sandra Rotman, and J. Richard Shiff and Family, as well as proceeds from the university's Brazilian Ball, the chair is a joint appointment of Baycrest and the faculty of social work.

Young Nat is a small guy with a big heart

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In hockey circles, particularly those in which starched, oversized collars are part of the dress code, an aphorism sometimes makes the rounds to describe the importance of grit and spunk in a hockey player.

"It's not the size of the dog in the fight that's important; it's the size of the fight in the dog."

Truer words were never spoken – at least in regards to a handful of feisty, economy-sized skaters like Henri Richard, Ken Linsman, Theo Fleury and Cory York.

Cory who?

York, as in the kid who put the York in Yorkshire terrier; the player who's built for speed but who likes nothing better than to run an oversized, lead-footed defenceman into the boards. The guy who jumped from Select hockey to AAA in one year. The guy who's an integral part of not just any shmei drei midget squad but of one of the best in North America. A team that finished first in the GTHL standings this year.

That Cory York.

At five-foot-seven, 160 pounds, York, 16, is the prototypical anti-power forward; a little guy, but one who plays "in your face" hockey.

Relying on hard work, determination, speed and skill, York willed his way onto the Young Nats AAA Bantam team last year and carried over onto the organization's Midget team in the current season.

A centre and winger, York is a gritty and tenacious performer who revels in the tough going.

"He's a heart and soul player on every shift," says Young Nats coach, Jim Wilson. "He's very committed to being the best he can be."

Last year when he tried out for the Young Nats' bantam team, he surprised a lot of people with his ability. "He flat out beat several boys who were considered to have more experience," Wilson said. "It's very unusual to go from a house league Select player to AAA. It's a big jump. Most boys do it slowly, via A or AA teams."

York, a student at Northview Heights Collegiate, knew he faced an uphill battle to make the jump to AAA hockey. "Kids on my team have been playing AAA at six or seven, before I started skating ," he said.

When he tried on his first pair of skates at eight or nine, he was already a couple of years behind. It took him a while to catch up, but he was aided by six straight years of attendance at the Hockey Opportunity Camp in South River. A couple of summers ago, York attended the Roger Neilson hockey camp in Metulla, Israel.

"It was a good experience. I got to meet a lot of people and hang out with Israelis," he said.

During his PeeWee and Minor Bantam seasons, he racked up 100-point seasons and helped lead Forest Hill to a two-year streak in which they went undefeated. In his Minor Bantam year he hooked up with Michael Lende. At that time, Lende was coach of the AAA Marlie Midgets, he ran his own hockey schools in the Detroit area and he had served as an assistant coach in the International Hockey League. They worked on York's technical skills, adding balance to his skating and giving him a heads-up on AAA competition. He also got him on the ice at a Marlies practice.

Cory York

"I was really nervous," York said, "but I think I held my own."

Lende also arranged a tryout for York with the Young Nats.

"It was hard, but I made the team," York said. "I was told that I made the team because of all the hard work I put into it... It came natural. I always work hard at hockey. That's the way I am."

His first AAA game proved a real eye-opener. While the pace was faster and the players a lot better than in Select, he was also taunted with, "Go back to Select."

York responded by scoring on his first shift, prompting the goalie to smash his stick in disgust for the ignominy of allowing a former Select player to score on him.

As the season progressed, York's bristly style was utilized to get under opponents' skin.

"Other teams took runs at me and I took stupid penalties," he said.

Beneath that prickly on-ice persona, however, lies a talented hockey player. "He's a very strong skater and he's very competitive," Wilson said. "He's a very skilled young man."

York fits in well with the Young Nats, a team loaded with talent. This year, with only a handful of games left in the season, the team has already wrapped up the Carnation Cup, awarded to the GTHL's regular season leader.

In the first 54 games of the season, York scored 15 goals and added 30 assists, while spending 150 minutes in the penalty box.

The Young Nats dominated the prestigious Big Nickel tournament in Sudbury in November, and York was named MVP of the championship game, in which he scored two goals in a 6-4 victory.

The Young Nats are favourites to win the Ontario championships later this season.

As for next year, York has a decision to make, but like most of his teammates, he'll probably make the move to tier II Junior hockey, a rung below Major Junior. York has said he'd like to follow his coach to the North York Rangers. After that, he'll consider continuing his hockey career at an NCAA school.

Tournament a continental confluence of hoopsters

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three hundred and sixty hoopsters from 13 Jewish schools across North America were in Toronto last week to participate in the fifth annual Israel Becker Memorial Basketball Tournament, hosted by the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

The tournament, rivaled in scope only by one sponsored by Yeshiva University in New York, brought together students from Toronto, New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Chicago, Miami, Boston, Ottawa, Montreal and Winnipeg.

Twelve boys teams and 12 girls teams, each gender divided into four pools of three, played a round robin format before being seeded for playoff rounds.

CHAT fielded four teams, Yeshivat Or Chaim of Toronto fielded one while Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate of Winnipeg, Bialik of Montreal and Yitzhak Rabin of Ottawa rounded out the Canadian participation.

The tournament is named for the late Israel Becker, a former CHAT student killed in an automobile accident. Becker was an avid basketball player and fan.

Aubrey Zimmerman, tournament co-ordinator along with Rabbi Yaakov Dan, said the co-ed format brings together Jewish students from all streams of Judaism.

"It's a premiere event and a defining moment to show that CHAT is a leading Jewish high school in North America," Zimmerman said.

Visiting students had a wide range of activities to keep them busy, Zimmerman said. In addition to the hard court action, a Tu b'Shvat Carnival, a Shabbaton and a discussion on the issue of tolerance were on the agenda.

The students were billeted with families in the vicinity of the Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Synagogue, where they attended Shabbat services. Basketball games were scheduled for gyms at CHAT and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

For more information, visit the tournament Web site at www.israelbecker.com.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

The 10th man

Near the Kensington Market in downtown Toronto, there is a small Orthodox shul that has been there for the better part of the century. Though its heyday is long past, the rabbi has still tried to ensure that the small shul would have a minyan for services everyday.

Thus, many a time, late in the day, the rabbi would wander the streets of this heavily ethnic neighborhood in search of prospective participants for his afternoon minyan.

Typically, the conversation would go something like this:

"Are you Jewish?"

If the answer was no, the rabbi wished the person a pleasant day and went off in search of his next prospect.

If the answer was yes, the person was invited to join the prayer service, which required 10 male Jewish participants, according to traditional Orthodox Judaism.

One day the rabbi spotted a young university student passing by the synagogue.

"Are you Jewish?" asked the rabbi.

"Well what if I am?" the student responded hurriedly. From his defensiveness, the rabbi immediately deduced he was Jewish, though in all probability alienated from his roots.

The rabbi decided to forge ahead, nonetheless.

"Well, we want you for our prayer service. You see, we need 10 men in order to hold our afternoon prayer service. Right now we only have nine men, and you'd be the 10th."

"But I don't even believe in God," protested the student.

"We'd still like you to join us," the rabbi calmly insisted.

"But I already told you, I don't even believe in God! Why should I take part in your service, if I'll get nothing out of it at all?" The irritation in the student's voice was noticeably rising.

"That's precisely the point," responded the rabbi.

"What do you mean?" The student looked perplexed.

"I would like you to join us just because you won't get anything out of it – and because others will. When was the last time you did something like that?"

The student stared at the rabbi for a long, long moment. Then, without a word, he followed the rabbi into the small shul, and fulfilled the mitzvah of being the 10th man.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Dan and I are planning to sell our house next month.

My dear friend Gail is a real estate agent. I don't want to let her sell my house because when she listed my last house, I was always last on her list. She assumed, because we were friends, she could handle all her other clients first and we would understand. The worst part was that when we actually had someone come in with an offer, she sent a junior from her office to handle it because she had a previous engagement. Needless to say, we lost that deal. Dan was fuming, blamed me and we had a huge fight.

I never said anything to Gail. When it was all over, I swore I would never do that again. Well here I am in the same boat and feeling very guilty. What should I do?

Delist My Friend

Dear Delist My Friend

You can mix business and friendship, but only under one circumstance. Both parties have to be "givers." If one of the parties is a "taker," the whole thing falls apart, bad feelings arise and often the relationship falls apart too.

This is true of doing any kind business with a friend – a lawyer, a plumber, a painter etc. If any of those people put you at the bottom of their list, they are taking advantage of your friendship. Likewise if you expect your friend to drop everything every time you call, you also become a "taker." There must be understanding and appreciation for the each other's situations.

Gail should have understood how important it was for you to sell your home. It is her job to present all offers and to make the sale happen as quickly and efficiently as possible. It is your job to be reasonable in your expectations without compromising your goal.

You and Gail need to talk. Let her know why you were upset the last time and why Dan and you made the decision you did this time. Don't try to hide it or fluff it off. The only way to get through this without hard feelings is to get it all out in the open.

SENSELESS SLAUGHTER: Soldiers hang their head in sorrow and disbelief last week, moments after eight of their colleagues were killed by a rampaging bus driver at a bus stop south of Tel Aviv. Twenty people were also injured when Khalil Abu Elba, 35, from Gaza, drove his bus into the crowd of waiting commuters on the morning of Feb. 14. [Israel photo]

Holocaust denial finds new home

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A gathering of Holocaust deniers in Lebanon is only the tip of the iceberg in the ongoing collaboration between neo-Nazi activists from the West and Muslim fundamentalists in the Arab world, according to an expert on Middle Eastern terror groups.

Muslim groups are copying age-old anti-Semitism," said Steven Emerson, producer of the PBS documentary, Jihad in America. "As I see it, they're the biggest promoters of it in the world today."

Spurred by opposition to Israel that spills over into overt anti-Semitism, the Arab world has proven a fertile ground for neo-Nazi propaganda.

From March 31 to April 3, the California-based Institute for Historical Review (IHR), the pseudo-intellectual wing of the Holocaust-denial movement, will hold a conference in Beirut on the topic of Revisionism and Zionism.

"Revisionism" is a term employed by Nazi propagandists to describe Holocaust denial and its corollary argument, that through the control of the world's media and power centres, Jews fabricated the Holocaust to justify the dispossession of Palestinians.

It has proved a potent argument in the Arab world, where mainstream newspapers, radio stations and even political leaders parrot the anti-Semitic line, while comparing Zionism to Nazism and Israeli leaders to Nazis.

Institute for Historical Review plans conference in Lebanon

The extremist right has recognized the potential for expansion in the Middle East."The awareness of the importance of the Holocaust story as a key propaganda tool of Israeli-Zionist interests is growing throughout the world, especially in Muslim countries," states the IHR Web site.

According to Emerson, the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL), the American Jewish Committee (AJC) and Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Holocaust-denial and Jewish conspiracy theories are widely accepted in the Arab world.

"It is a new and developing trend," said AJC spokesperson Yehudit Barsky. "Both believe in conspiracy theories and the Jews as Satan's face."

The location of the IHR conference was not chosen by accident, Rabbi Cooper said. "We see a very dramatic rise in the Holocaust denial mindset throughout the Palestinian and certain parts of the Arab and Muslim world."

The case of French Holocaust denier Roger Garaudy, a convert to Islam, is illustrative. Garaudy was found guilty of questioning crimes against humanity and of racial defamation.

Car Shot At

JERUSALEM — A Canadian Embassy vehicle travelling north of Jerusalem came under fire by a Palestinian gunman last Thursday. The car was en route between the community of Givat Zeev and Jerusalem's northern Ramot neighbourhood when it was fired on. There were no injuries or damage caused in the attack on the armoured vehicle, which had diplomatic plates and flew the Canadian flag. The assailant reportedly fled into the nearby village of El Jib.

Woman Arrested

JERUSALEM — Israeli police last week arrested the leader of the right-wing Women in Green group at an Israel Defence Force roadblock in the Gush Etzion settlement bloc south of Jerusalem. Nadia Matar was arrested during an apparent altercation with police, according to the Jerusalem Post. The group was demonstrating against what it said was lax enforcement of IDF policy forbidding Palestinian men from driving on West Bank roads.

Quake Baby

JERUSALEM — Israeli medics who delivered a baby in the earthquake-stricken area of India last week dubbed the infant "Sharon," after newly elected prime minister Ariel Sharon. The daily Yediot Achronot reported that the baby was born shortly after the results of the Israeli election became known.

WORLD

Skverer Rebbe Dies

NEW YORK — Rabbi David Twersky, leader of a branch of the chassidic Skverer dynasty, died Feb. 2 of complications from heart and kidney ailments. He was 79. Rabbi Twersky, who lived in Brooklyn's Borough Park section, helped many Holocaust survivors immigrate to the United States.

Jews Targets

WASHINGTON — The overwhelming majority of hate crimes directed at property in 1999 involved Jewish targets, according to an FBI report on hate crimes. There were 1,289 such attacks on Jewish targets that year, said the report. Blacks were the most frequent victims of hate crimes against individuals, according to the report.

IBM-Shoah Link

NEW YORK — A new book accuses IBM of providing data-processing technology that helped the Nazis carry out genocide. The allegations in Edwin Black's IBM and the Holocaust: The Strategic Alliance Between Nazi Germany and America's Most Powerful Corporation are also the focus of a lawsuit filed over the weekend against IBM in New York.

Violence Increases

BERLIN — Extremist violence in Germany increased by 40 percent during the first 11 months of 1999, according to Germany's interior minister. Half of the 13,753 attacks occurred in eastern Germany, where only 21 percent of the country's population lives.

Rabbis Unite

WASHINGTON — Israel's chief rabbis joined with Conservative and Reform rabbis in a rare display of unanimity to sign a petition condemning violence against any religious institutions in the Jewish state. In the petition, the rabbis declared that any attack in any community "will be considered an attack against us all."

Oscar Nominees

LOS ANGELES — A film on the Nazi-era rescue of refugee children, most of them Jewish, has been nominated for an Oscar in the documentary feature category. Into the Arms of Strangers: Stories of the Kindertransport chronicles the rescue of some 10,000 children from Nazi-dominated Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia in the 18 months leading up to World War II. The Kindertransport film was only one of several Jewish- and Nazi-themed nominations announced last Tuesday. One Day Crossing, about a Jewish woman who poses as a Christian in 1944 Budapest, was nominated in the category of live action short film. Jan Hrebejk's Divided We Fall, a contender for best foreign language film, is a Czech dark comedy about a childless couple who hides its former neighbour from the Nazis after the young man escapes from a death camp.

Jews Named to Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Several prominent Jewish Canadians have been named to the Order of Canada. They are among the 98 new appointments to the order announced last week by Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson.

Named as companions, the order's highest rank, are Jack Diamond of Vancouver for philanthropy (a promotion within the order), and author Mordecai Richler.

Named as members are Judy Feld Carr of Toronto, who led a 25-year clandestine campaign to rescue thousands of Jews from Syria; Toronto developer and philanthropist Murray Frum; Norbert Rubin Morgenstern of Edmonton for engineering; Mona Winberg, who writes a Toronto Sun column on disabled affairs; and Lt.-Col. (Ret.) J. Joel Wolfe of Montreal, a founding member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

On Feb. 28, 51 Canadians who were named to the order in November will be invested in a formal ceremony presided over by Clarkson. They will include volunteer Morley Cohen of Montreal and Toronto philanthropist Edward Bronfman.

Does zero tolerance mean zero rights?

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Feature

TORONTO — Students, parents, teachers and principals may soon find themselves facing new school rules.

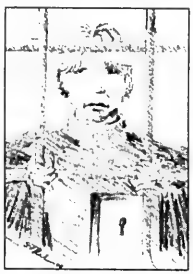
Last summer, the Ontario Ministry of Education introduced a new Safe Schools Act, which included a mandatory Code of Conduct.

When passed into law, the code and its regulations could significantly affect the way public schools in the province deal with issues of discipline, said Eric Roher, an education law specialist who has also written several books on the topic, including An Educator's Guide to Violence in Schools.

Roher, who advises school boards and independent schools, said the most sweeping change to the provincial Education Act is in regard to the zero-tolerance approach to suspensions and expulsions.

Under the new code, teachers and principals could be forced to respond to certain situations with mandatory, pre-determined repercussions.

Most significant, he noted, is the removal of the principal's discretion to determine whether misconduct by a student warrants suspension or expulsion.



What did I do?

While the code represents the government's response to what it perceives as an increase in serious incidents of violence in its schools, Roher said, these amendments could affect students' rights, "such as the right to a hearing, the right not to be punished unreasonably, the right to freedom of religion and the right to equality."

One of the problems is that the code, in its present form, does not take into account special education concerns, issues of self-defence or situations pertaining to third parties, Roher said.

"Without being able to take into account any mitigating factors, the suspension and expulsion process could become increasingly litigious."

"While everyone has an issue over which they would want a zero-tolerance policy, it does create additional problems," said Seymour Epstein, executive director of the UJA Board of Jewish Education.

"Everyone is rethinking a lot of these issues," Epstein said in an interview. "While there was a rush to zero tolerance a few years ago, now people are realizing they have to review these practices.

"One of the big problems is that zero tolerance does not permit a principal to have compassion, even though circumstances would clearly indicate that compassion is called for."

The zero-tolerance tone in the existing provincial code is filled with potential for unfairness, said Cheryl Milne, a lawyer with the Canadian Foundation for Justice for Children and Youth.

Students with special needs and learning disabilities could find themselves suspended and expelled for behaviours that are easily dealt with in the current school system. In addition, children could find themselves expelled for the behaviour of other students.

Milne, who also has a master's degree in social work, noted that "ultimately, these types of policies will result in an adverse effect on the relationship between students, teachers and principals."

The code could compel teachers to suspend children for certain behaviours without allowing the kids to tell their side of the story, Milne explained. This could only have a negative impact on the teacher/student dynamic.

A suspension should be a private matter between a child and the principal. Bringing the process into the classroom not only is humiliating for the student involved, but the rest of the class is drawn into issues of fairness and rights.

In each instance, the teacher is put into an adversarial role, rather than a supportive and educative one, Milne said.

"There are a variety of different punishments that are available for specific crimes," Epstein noted. "Some of them should be private and confidential, and no one else should know about them. Under those circumstances, a child might still learn strong lessons.

"If you add public embarrassment to that punishment, you may be entering the realm of the counterproductive. Any positive effects will be lost and the child will rebel against the authority responsible for the policy."

"There are many teachers who do not want the power to suspend," Milne said.

In fact, the Ontario English Catholic Teachers Association has advised its members to refer all suspensions to the principal, rather than dealing with such issues themselves.

"Zero-tolerance discipline is a backwards step," Milne said. "Discipline shouldn't always mean punishment. There are much more effective ways to help children today."

"Institutions will often take the path of least resistance," Epstein said. "And zero-tolerance policies offer a very easy path. It's a way for principals to say, 'I'm just following orders.'"

The changes in the code will also mean that the principal will become less involved in pedagogy and more involved in investigatory duties, Milne said.

"The role of the principal will be reduced to determining whether he or she did it," rather than "How can we help him or her?"

By eliminating the pedagogical aspects of the disciplinary process and mandating penalties, our provincial education system could become even more punitive than our criminal justice system for young people, Milne said.

"And is that what education is about?"

* * *

In a recent lecture organized by the Canadian Bar Association, Roher and Milne noted that the severity of the code will depend on provincial regulations and mitigating factors, which have not yet been released.

The hope is that the mitigating factors will be quite broad in order to restore discretion and flexibility to the principals, Roher said.

In the meantime, as part of an overall education plan, the province has allocated resources for the opening of alternative strict schools for expelled students.

While these schools currently hold great promise as "islands of excellence," Roher said, it is a shame that some of these resources couldn't be allocated to provide preventive measures for children in the early school years.

* * *

Private schools are not currently bound by the province's code of conduct, Roher said in an interview. However, there is some indication that they are bound to the basic requirements of procedural fairness when it comes to issues of discipline.

A recurring nightmare

From the editor's desk

The photo, inset, is as much a recurring nightmare, as it is a piercing expression of sorrow.

Israeli soldiers, barely holding back tears, grieve again for yet another life cut short by murderers. They are at the funeral of their friend, one of eight Israelis mowed down last week, like inanimate wooden bowling pins, by a driver steering his bus, and his life, by hate.

Of course, there is death and grieving among Palestinians as well. Nor do Israeli tears burn hotter on the cheek than Palestinian tears. Sorrow pains as deeply for Palestinians as for Israelis. I do not differentiate between suffering or make light of Palestinian suffering.

But there is indeed a difference in the circumstances giving rise to the suffering. And it is therefore valid to differentiate between the behaviour of the two clashing sides and the values underlying that behaviour.

Israel, a democracy, where the rule of law and the sanctity of life are the highest virtues, is striving to find peace with its neighbours.

The Palestinian Authority (PA), a government-in-waiting for the Palestinian people, is an autocracy where the only rule is that of concentrated authority in one man. The sanctity of life is meaningless to the PA. Their motivation is rather to destroy Israel than to build Palestine, the latter, they believe, destined to arise only as a natural sequela of the former.

People who deny this difference are also denying – or worse, distorting – the truth. For example, some people last week criticized Israel and equated the recent pinpoint, pre-emptive strikes by the IDF against the leaders of the terrorists, with the gruesome bus-stop massacre.

Such a comparison however, is invidious, nothing more than a veil masking an unfriendly attitude toward Israel.

For Israel to face this criticism in its life-and-death struggle against the extremist, totalitarian forces intent on doing it harm amounts to nothing more than base hypocrisy.

The pre-emptive strikes are a legitimate form of self-defence. They strike at the very people who control, plan, direct and perpetrate the terrorist actions inside Israel. If Israel has the possibility, if not the certainty, of preventing these acts, it is obliged by the dictates of decency and conscience to do so. That is its and all governments' inviolate duty to its citizens.

No western government, including Canada, would act otherwise; no western people, including Canadians, would expect less from their government.

The pre-emptive strikes are also an effort by Israel to reduce the number of civilian casualties that inevitably result in wholesale confrontations between the child stonethrowers, the machine gun-toting Tanzim, the hate-filled Islamic Jihad and the IDF.

Hatred has now become the key catechism of Palestinian religious and national instruction; and violence towards the objects of that hatred – the Jews – its horrific product.

But hatred is usually self-sustaining. It will be very difficult, if not impossible for Yasser Arafat to merely close the spigot once a Palestinian state is created. The seeds sown in such noxious dredge will yield only a harvest of more hatred and violence.

David Bedein, a colleague in Jerusalem, the bureau chief of Israel Resource News Agency, sent the following news item last week in the aftermath of the hit-and-run massacre. It demonstrates more poignantly perhaps than any editorial could, the differing values underlying the two societies.

"On Feb. 14, 2001, as three Jewish girls fought for their lives after a Gazan bus driver deliberately struck them down, killing eight young Israelis, another young woman, Chamutal was involved in another type of battle.

"When she was 13, Chamutal was critically injured in a similar attack in Jerusalem's Kiryat HaYovel neighbourhood. She and a group of girls were waiting by a bus stop when a Gazan Arab plowed his car into them. Chamutal suffered multiple injuries necessitating numerous operations over the years.

"Last week, Chamutal was the doctor on call at Kaplan Hospital in Rechovot when Khalil Abu Elba, 35 years old, the driver who plowed his bus into the unsuspecting Israelis, was wheeled into the operating room. She was one of the medical staff that helped save his life.

"Contrast this with the behaviour of the Palestinian snipers who fired upon Israeli paramedics last Sunday night fighting to save the life of Tzachi Sasson who was shot while driving in the Tunnel Road on the way to Gush Etzion. Sasson, also 35 years old, died of his wounds."

Immigrant youth group up and running

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It took a tragedy in order to get a youth project aimed at Russian and Israeli immigrant teens up and running.

"The beating death of Matti Baranovski was a wake-up call to the community," says Mila Voihanski, director of immigrant services at Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto.

After Matti died, she said, people started questioning the lack of programs available to immigrant youth. "As a result, UJA FEDERATION received a $250,000 grant that was earmarked for a youth project co-ordinated by JIAS."

The plan is for the money to last three years, after which the project, which began last June, will be reviewed, she said.

Teens from 13 to 18 are at a vulnerable age, said Voihanski. "Immigrant teens, especially, do not feel accepted in general community programs, and if they feel alienated, they will not join.

"We do run programs with Canadian youth, but we want the Russian and Israeli teens to feel safe, secure and comfortable before moving into an integrated setting."

The aim of the project is to build the teens' self-esteem and develop leadership skills that can be used in the general community, she said.

To that end, said Jenya Zukershtein, a JIAS Toronto youth worker, they developed a five-day leadership development summer camp together with the Jewish Board of Education.

"The teens, who came in shifts, participated in sports, leadership and Judaic programs and arts and crafts. They loved the experience of sleeping in tents near the lake. This summer we're planning seven-day shifts," Zukershtein said.

In September, Toronto Parks and Recreation helped establish a Sunday drop-in centre from 4 to 6 p.m. at the Antibes Community Centre.

"They play table tennis, watch movies, listen to music and even take part in cooking classes. A job club run by Jewish Vocational Services helps the teens write resumes and look for jobs, and JVS is committed to helping them find summer employment.

"It's a place to come and meet new friends, and it's an alternative to hanging out on the street or in apartment lobbies. We get anywhere from 10 to 30 teens every week," she said.

A core group of about 20 teens helps organize the programs, she said, that have included bowling, a Chanukah party and a barbeque at Earl Bales Park. Other plans include a tour of Toronto, a photo contest, a Purim celebration and a Passover seder.

On March 25, the group has planned a sale of the teens' artwork at Bernard Betel Centre, organized with the help of the Russian Jewish Initiative.

Irina Tchertak, 16, a Grade 11 student at Newtonbrook Secondary School who has been in Canada for four years, says she participates in most of the programs, and "It's been a lot of fun. It gives me a way to keep busy."

She credits Zukershtein with helping her find work as a counsellor at a children's summer day camp that JIAS and Toronto Parks and Recreation run at Fisherville Junior High School.

Elena Aleinikov, president of JIAS and co-chair with Yale Drazin of the advisory council on immigrant youth formed in May in order to organize the youth project, said she is impressed with the variety of programs that have been developed. Solid links have been formed with other community organizations, such as Jewish Family & Child Services and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, who has provided scholarships to some of the youth.

"Representatives of the Toronto District School Board and the police force have told me they are amazed at the amount of work that has been accomplished in such a short time."

Voihanski said, however, that "It is a long process. At that age, the teens do not initially trust us, and we have to build up that trust. They expect us to lecture them, but we really just want to make their life happier.

"When they understand they we want them to feel safe and good, they relax and have a good time."

Congress opposes public funding for circumcision challenge

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is calling on the Court Challenges program of Canada to deny funding to a group that opposes male circumcisions.

A new group, called the Association for Genital Integrity (AGI), has requested more than $46,000 in federal funds to help it prepare a charter challenge to a criminal court provision that criminalizes female genital mutilation, but which remains silent on male circumcision.

The group contends that differential treatment violates the equality provision of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Congress believes the anti-circumcision movement is marginal at best and that its arguments have no legal merit.

"We are certainly going to let the Court Challenges Program know that we oppose a charter challenge on the basis that it's a frivolous application and a waste of taxpayers' money," said Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

The federal Court Challenges Program funds historically disadvantaged organizations that wish to bring equality and language rights issues before the courts.

To receive funding, applicants must show they are raising a new issue in a test case of national significance, that chances for success are feasible and that the applicants are a historically disadvantaged group. The panel allocating funds also examines the impact of the test case on other groups protected by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In a letter to Melina Buckley, executive director of the Court Challenges Program, Congress argued that the equation of male circumcision to female genital mutilation "is spurious and unwarranted, considering that circumcision is a [minor] procedure."

The letter, written by Manuel Prutschi, Congress' national director of community relations, states the anti-circumcision group does not qualify for assistance. It is not historically disadvantaged nor does its case advance equality rights, he stated.

Keith Landy

"AGI's aim to deligitimize male circumcision is tantamount to an attack on one of the core religious rituals of the Jewish and Muslim faiths. Were it to succeed, it would violate the very Charter rights of Canadian Jews and Muslims, two equality-seeking groups that have been historically disadvantaged, to preserve and enhance their multicultural heritage and to enjoy freedom of conscience and religion," Prutschi stated.

AGI spokesperson Dr. Arif Bhimji, a Newmarket physician who is Muslim, has argued that circumcisions that are not warranted for medical reasons should be considered a criminal assault. Furthermore, he argues, parents' rights to their religious beliefs cannot trump the right of a child to security of the person – a right that is guaranteed in the charter.

Congress and B'nai Brith Canada officials have said they would seek intervener status in any court case on male circumcision.

"Any attempt to undermine a religious right of both Jews and Muslims would be vigorously fought," Landy said. "It's the very essence of the covenant between the Jewish people and God."

Zero tolerance, zero rights?

Behavioural codes currently being used by the Jewish day schools range in tone from very rigid zero-tolerance rules to more flexible individual plans of behaviour modification.

In an effort to reduce some of the confusion out there about behavioural codes, the Day School Principals' Association, which is made up of many of the Jewish day school principals, is currently attempting to formulate a common policy on suspensions and expulsions, Epstein said.

Epstein noted that it will then be up to each school to determine whether it wants to adopt the code put together by the Principals' Association.

Priests and rabbis tackle difficult issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As long as Christians accept the legitimacy of the Jewish covenant, and as long as Jews accept that Christians are not idolaters, the two communities have a lot to talk about, according to Rabbi David Novak.

The chair of Judaic Studies at the University of Toronto and an author of Dabru Emet: A Jewish Statement on Christians and Christianity published last year, Rabbi Novak was a speaker at a day of study for priests and rabbis, held last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The meeting was convened to address difficult texts associated with Passover and the Easter Triduum (the period encompassing the evening of Holy Thursday – the day preceding Good Friday – Good Friday itself and Easter Sunday).

It was held under the auspices of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto, with co-chairs Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Rev. Damian Macpherson representing each one respectively. The study day was a follow-up to last year's meeting at Toronto's Catholic Pastoral Centre to discuss theology and practice related to marriage.

The very fact that the meeting was taking place was still fodder for discussion. Such a meeting would have been unheard of 30 or 40 years ago, said Rev. Thomas Rosica, national director of World Youth Day 2002 for the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Rabbi Novak believes that the theological preconditions for interfaith discussion are in place. He also noted a precondition at the political level – the acceptance by Christians "that the Jewish people have a legitimate claim on the land of Israel."

Christians, particularly Catholics, have undergone "impressive theological rethinking" in the past 40 years, said Rabbi Novak. He mentioned in particular the pontificate of John Paul II, noting that he (the pope) grew up among Jews, was impressed by Jewish piety and can converse in Yiddish.

The rabbi explained that Christians have more of a theological problem with Judaism than Jews have with Christianity. The problem Jews have had with Christians has been political rather than theological, he said, although Jews do have a theological problem with Christians who want them to convert.

From the political perspective, Jews today are facing new questions of moral responsibility as a result of having political power over non-Jews – the reverse of the situation that has been true for most of Jewish history, explained Rabbi Novak.

In the context of his discussion on the Passover narrative, Rabbi Novak said he thinks the claims of Moses and the children of Israel, and their negotiation process with Pharoah, present a model for "at least thinking about the resolution" of the situation in present-day Israel.

From the Catholic perspective, Rev. Rosica said that one way of dealing with the Passion narratives (describing Jesus' suffering and death) is by "not denying...that some Jewish leaders were involved in a sort of collusion," said Rev. Rosica.

He stressed, however, that the majority of Jews, "suffering under Roman domination, could hardly have been held responsible for the death of Jesus."

Making the connection between the suffering and death of Jesus, and the suffering of the Jewish people, could become "a very important part" of Easter, he suggested.

Catholics must confront anti-Semitism in the New Testament's Book of John, he said. "It does not do any good to pretend it is not there."

However, that anti-Jewish sentiment "is no longer authentic Christian proclamation today," Rev. Rosica said. As an example, he noted that since 1963, Catholics no longer pray for the "perfidious" Jews.

"We have absolutely no responsibility, no right, no reason to proclaim and continue this animosity today, even in light of political realities that involve Jews and involve the State of Israel," he said, noting that from his point of view the Jewish covenant is "theologically intact," and "the Hebrew scriptures...a source of ongoing rich and deep meaning."

Regarding Israel, he said that Catholics are not asking for a claim on Jerusalem and have "no desire" to have a Vatican or mini-Vatican in Jerusalem, but do want a place at the table when Jerusalem is discussed. The Pope has spoken strongly about a unique international status for the city, he noted.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin, speaking on pastoral concerns, defined difficult texts as those that "give evidence of where we overlap, where common misunderstandings bind us together."

Fear of sharing misgivings about a particular text can lead to rejection of organized religion, he warned. Religious leaders, he said, bear a heavy responsibility if they allow people to see them validating stereotypes or sources of friction.

There's an obligation to be honest about what the text seems to say and to have a consistent personal or theological approach, he stressed. He also noted that "we on the Jewish side have the enormous burden of educating ourselves and our congregation about what Christianity and Catholicism are and are not."

Rev. Paul Cusack of St. Gabriel's Church said he believes the church deals with difficult text every Sunday, not just on Good Friday.

"I think we should be stressing Sunday after Sunday that Jesus was a Jew," he said. Reading the gospels without understanding the context in which they were written has fostered anti-Semitism, he added.

On one level, "we've got a long way to go," said Rev. Paul McGill of Holy Rosary Roman Catholic Church, in summing up. "I feel we really made some progress...I believe we can make a difference."

Canadians might understand now

Speaking last week to Geoffrey York, the veteran Globe and Mail reporter, Hussum Khader, "head of the largest Palestinian Fatah militia in Nablus," told Canadians: "If Canada is serious about resettlement you could expect military attacks in Ottawa or Montreal. Resettlement would be a catastrophe for the Palestinian nation. This is the issue we've been fighting for 50 years."

There, in a hard-core, jagged-edged nutshell on page 1 of the Globe and Mail of Feb. 16, was the eye-opening, but sad capsule of the tragedy of the Palestinian people, the harsh recurring elements of that tragedy laid bare for all Canadians to read if not understand.

• You could expect military attacks in Ottawa or Montreal. Violence – the mayhem, the suffering, the sorrow – is not repugnant to Khader. On the contrary, he predicts its use as casually as if he were predicting bad weather. Violence has been the Palestinian trademark.

• Fatah militia. Khader belongs to the Fatah militia, the so-called mainstream of the Palestinian people, the largest constituency group under the large PLO umbrella. It is not Hamas, Islamic Jihad or any of the myriad other radical organizations. What does this say about the leadership of the Palestinian people, the example it sets and the values it inculcates, if even the "moderate," mainstream leadership so readily advocates and relies upon the use of violence?

In truth, ever since it became apparent more than 52 years ago, that compromise would be necessary between Jews and Arabs, the Palestinians have been betrayed time and again by their own leaders. If these leaders had only loved their own people as much as they hated the Jews, or been concerned for the well-being of their own people as much as they have been obsessed with the annihilation of the Jews, they would long ago have relieved the Palestinian people's suffering.

• Resettlement would be a catastrophe... This is the issue we've been fighting for 50 years. Palestinian leaders have perpetuated one theme and one theme only for Palestinian history, namely, catastrophe, or nakba, as they refer to the creation of the State of Israel. Between 1948 and 1967, Palestinian life could have been rebuilt in the West Bank and Gaza. Jordan, Egypt and the then-nascent PLO leadership preferred to foster dreams of displacement among Palestinians rather than acts of resettlement for them. The sheer, plain humanitarianism of trying to relieve suffering has never been an option. Now two entire generations of Palestinians have been raised on the false promise and the false hope of the right of return,which, in its true, unembellished, practical application means the expulsion of the Jews.

But this will simply never happen.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, 2000 in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Israel wants to see all of us

I have never felt so overwhelmed with thought and emotion as in the past few weeks, since I visited Israel as chair of the North American Young Leadership Mission that joined 900 other people on solidarity missions.

The Israelis I met spoke of the depression that has settled on all Israelis and how their dreams for a true and lasting peace have been shattered.

Before Shabbat, I davened at the Kotel and danced and sang with students of Yeshivat Hakotel and for just a few minutes, I was able to forget the stress of the crisis, until I suddenly looked up and saw how many soldiers were surrounding us so that we could pray and welcome the Shabbat peacefully.

After Shabbat I experienced the euphoria of 4,000 young adults on their last night in Israel on Birthright.

In Eilat, while jogging one night, I passed a group of Israeli soldiers who were around a campfire on the beach. They were on a night off, celebrating the early retirement of one of their group who had suffered a heart attack a month earlier.

I joined the celebration, drank, sang and danced with them. The soldiers presented their retiring 50-year-old colleague with a hand-made plaque and we all blessed him with life until 120. In response, he cried like a seven-year-old child. We were later joined by a rabbi who was strolling on the beach. Our discussion eventually turned to the current crisis and a discussion of where is God? I soon realized that even the rabbi has moments of disillusionment.

Israel wants to see all of us. It is reaching out for support. I urge you to go to Israel, even if just for a few days, and provide the support that is so desperately needed, deserved and appreciated.

Why I voted for Sharon

The Palestinians missed the boat again, as they did in 1947 when they rejected the UN Partition Plan creating two States – one Jewish and one Arab – with Jerusalem as an international city.

After Camp David and the refusal of Yasser Arafat to compromise, Ehud Barak should have given the Palestinians his telephone number and told them, "When you are ready, give me a call." Instead he kept running after them and received violence in return.

Barak did not succeed, so we must give Ariel Sharon a chance.

Calls for environmental diligence

What a surprise and encouragement to read Rabbi Gunther Plaut's article on Jewish responsibility for the protection of the earth (CJN, Jan 18). While we have focused so much on social justice issues, we have too often been guilty of environmental complacency.

The one area of Jewish life that would have a considerable impact on this mitzvah would be the elimination of paper, plastic and styrofoam dishes and utensils at synagogue functions. If we are serious about the environment, our laziness and "attitude" towards this issue must be challenged.

Right of return spells Israel's end

It's hard to comprehend how The CJN (Feb. 8) can label people calling for the destruction of the State of Israel, "dovish," as in the headline to David Lazarus' article, "Dovish talk sparks lively debate in Montreal."

Let's stop being naive; let's call a spade a spade. People interested in peace would want Arab refugees to be part of a newly created Palestinian state. Stop ignoring demographics.

Calling for the so-called "right of return" for the Arab refugees – unprecedented in history – would mean the end of Israel as our Jewish homeland. It's that simple.

Iranian reforms are empty rhetoric

That Iran's Supreme Court has denied the appeal of 10 Iranian Jews convicted of spying for Israel should come as no surprise. The original trial was devoid of any semblance of a judicial process. Independent observers were denied entry, and the accused were denied the right to counsel of their own choosing.

Your paper continues, as you should, to name the 10 on your editorial page. It is important that all Jews who believe in the rule of law write to our government and urge intervention at the highest level to ensure that these victims of blatant anti-Semitism are released and returned to their families. It is clear that all these so called reforms in Iran are nothing more than empty rhetoric and that Iran continues to harbour its hatred for Israel and all Jews throughout the world.

Perspectives

An International Criminal Court to prosecute the most egregious of international crimes, including genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity, has been contemplated ever since the landmark Nuremberg hearings that followed World War II. On July 17, 1998, near the end of a decade of ethnic cleansing and genocide, an international conference was held in Rome. There, 120 states voted in favour of, while seven opposed (including Israel), a treaty establishing the first permanent international tribunal.

The Israeli government decided, on Dec. 31, 2000, after a week of intense discussions, to sign the treaty, a step taken by the U.S. government on the same day.

The treaty will come into effect when 60 states have both signed and ratified it. At present, some 139 states have signed and 28 have ratified it, and it is expected that the requisite number of ratifications will be achieved in the next 18 months.

Israel should participate in struggle against int'l crimes

Fifty years ago, in the immediate aftermath of the "judgment at Nuremberg" and the Genocide Convention, the UN General Assembly codified the Nuremberg Principles, including the principle that individuals, even heads of state, are criminally responsible for the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Irwin Cotler

It is not surprising then, given the continuing and pervasive state of international criminality, and the impunity accompanying it, that the idea and inspiration for establishing an International Criminal Court (ICC) has remained on the international agenda since the judgement at Nuremberg.

Regrettably — and surprisingly to many — Israel was one of the seven countries to originally vote in 1998 against the treaty and the establishment of the ICC. Indeed, the Jewish people had been among the first advocates of such a court, seeing it as the institutionalization of the Nuremberg legacy. Moreover, the Israeli Supreme Court, in the Adolph Eichmann case, was the first to invoke and apply the Genocide Convention, and to support the principle of universal jurisdiction to prosecute war criminals.

One might ask, why should Israel believe the international community would not use the treaty against the Jewish state when a provision against transferring civilians, directly or indirectly, into "occupied territories." is included in the treaty and when the UN Human Rights Commission recently condemned Israel for "war crimes and crimes against humanity" committed during the current intifada?

Moreover, Israeli nationals could be indicted even if Israel were not a state party to the treaty. One of the bases for jurisdiction is that the crime be committed on the territory of a state party. Accordingly, even if Israel does not ratify the treaty, an indictment could always be entered against an Israeli national for a "war crime" allegedly committed on Syrian territory, Lebanon, or on the territory of the prospective state of Palestine.

Second, even if there were no ICC Treaty — or if Israel was not a party to it — Israeli nationals, like those of any country, could still be indicted under the "Pinochet Doctrine" which makes former heads of state and other senior officials accountable for international crimes, based on the principle of universal jurisdiction.

Third, at a meeting of the preparatory commission of the ICC in June 2000 held to define the elements of crimes, a footnote was inserted to the effect that the definition of transfer in the "occupied territories provision" would be that which is in accordance with international humanitarian law, i.e., without the "directly or indirectly" elasticity, and pursuant to the Genocide Convention of which Israel is already a state party.

Fourth, given that an overwhelming number of states will sign – and many will ratify – the treaty, and that major Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) are strongly supportive of it, Israel's non-signature would clearly have prejudiced its standing in the "court of public opinion," and would have been projected as a "presumption of guilt" rather than a "presumption of innocence."

Fifth, Israel has signed the treaty together with an interpretive declaration that its signature reflects, and represents, its historical commitment to the foundational principles of international humanitarian law and the Nuremberg legacy. However, should the treaty be politicized and malicious prosecutions be launched, Israel could declare that it would have no other choice than to withdraw its signature, while the very integrity of the court and international justice would be undermined.

Finally, Israel might subsequently agree to ratify the treaty, which would have its own inherent advantages i.e. that as a member of the Assembly of State Parties, Israel could participate in the development of the ICC process, including the choice of prosecutor and composition of the court; that it could utilize to advantage "the complementarity principle" whereby the ICC will only exercise its jurisdiction if a state party is "unable or unwilling" to do so, such that the "first resort" under this principle to the highly respected Israeli judicial system would be determinative and dispositive; and that, as in the case of France, it could exercise the "opting out" provision from the court's jurisdiction over war crimes for a period of seven years.

In a word, Israeli apprehensions could well have been realized even if Israel did not sign the treaty, while Israel would have lost the considerable advantages that attended its signature, including taking a leading role in the international struggle against impunity.

Irwin Cotler is MP for Mount Royal and special advisor to the minister of foreign affairs on the ICC.

The ICC will be employed by Israel's enemies against it

Ehud Barak should not have endorsed the creation of the International Criminal Court (ICC). He was pressed to do so by former U.S. president Bill Clinton who, in turn, had signed on at the urging of human rights organizations.

Edward L. Greenspan

The UN is virulently anti-Israel. The vast majority of its members are Arab and other Muslim countries, as well as developing countries that revile and censure Israel for genocide and systematic and gross violations of human rights.

Last September, after being cleared in advance by the head of Palestinian Authority security, Ariel Sharon walked on the Temple Mount to show his opposition to any agreement curtailing the right of any Jew to visit that holiest of Jewish places. Violent disturbances followed.

The so-called "Al-Aksa intifadah" was an uprising looking for an excuse to happen. Yasser Arafat says Jerusalem is not a Jewish city; the Western Wall is not a Jewish shrine, but a Muslim one; the two Temples never stood on the Temple Mount. He calls for a jihad to liquidate Israel.

In two years, the UN passed more than 100 anti-Israel resolutions, repeatedly labelling Israel an aggressor state. The General Assembly accused it of oppression, ethnic cleansing and being "an occupying power." Then came Resolution 1322.

The UN Human Rights Commission accused Israel's "occupying authorities" of deliberate and systematic killing of civilians, "crimes against humanity," massacring "innocent" children (stone-slingers), and genocide. This, while Palestinian rioting with automatic firearms, burning of civilian buses, lynching of Israelis and the destruction of Joseph's Tomb were studiously ignored.

Israel's population is 6.3 million (1.1 million Arabs). With the Arab attack on the newborn State of Israel in 1948, some 750,000 Palestinian Arabs fled. The irredentism of their descendants, whose numbers have swollen to almost four million, is guaranteed as a "right" in UN Resolution 194. Israel is not going to radically change the makeup of its population by accepting large numbers of refugees, so it may be prosecuted for "ethnic cleansing." The thought of this happening is obscene, but very real.

As the ICC is independent of the UN Security Council and not subject to a U.S. veto, it can act as police, prosecutor, judge, jury and jailer. Critics of the ICC have rightly called it "a politicized kangaroo court" and "politics in black robes."

Courts rightly decide on legal issues, not moral, much less political, guilt or innocence. The world will now have a body cloaked with judicial authority, and therefore, ostensible legitimacy to change bitter political issues into criminal indictments. For instance, the Rome Treaty – adopted in Rome July 1999 as the groundwork for the functioning of the ICC – states that "aggression" is a crime, but does not define it. Israel's attack on the Iraqi nuclear research centre on June 7, 1981, destroying a reactor in the final stages of construction, may now be judged by the ICC to be a crime of "aggression" rather than pre-emptive self-defence.

When Barak apologized for the death of 13 Arab Israelis shot by police during protests, it did not dawn on him that he may thereby have made a confession admissible in an ICC courtroom. Israel, he said, was acting in self-defence. Self-defence, however, is unacceptable to the ICC if it is "excessive" – a very elastic and subjective notion. The potential for egregious abuse is obvious. Every measure of Israeli self-preservation can be labelled a war crime. Without a U.S. veto, Israel will find itself defenceless at the hands of the ICC.

A last minute amendment to the Rome Treaty expanded the definition of war crimes to include: "The transfer, directly or indirectly, by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies, or the deportation or transfer of all or parts of the population of the occupied territory within or outside this territory." This amendment was blatantly designed to criminalize Jewish settlements in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza.

It has been suggested that Israel could utilize "the complimentarity principle," a notion that means Israel could avoid the ICC by conducting criminal trials of its own leaders inside the country. Yet this is like Britain indicting Winston Churchill after World War II for bombing Dresden. Since Israel knows that its acts are to safeguard its very existence, it is not going to turn around and indict its leadership. The concept is a sham.

The ICC and the notions concocted to justify it are all insidious. Alexis de Tocqueville once wrote, "He who punishes the criminal is the real master of society." As long as Israel remains under siege, it must not support an institution whose processes can be abused to weaken or destroy it.

Opinions

Names, names

Last week's column dealt with the names that people give to their children; this week I turn to family identifiers they have adopted and that reveal much about the culture in which they live and their relationship to it. People either conform to their environment or are dissidents who defy common practice. Jews are no exception to this rule, and especially in the Diaspora have often exemplified it.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

There was a time in North American history when Jews who came with names that revealed their Jewish background felt compelled to hide and act like chameleons who try to camouflage their appearance. This, they were convinced, made it possible for them to succeed in their businesses and professions, while their Jewish monikers were believed to be – and all too often were indeed – a serious hindrance.

Nowhere was this practice more common than with stage and film entertainers. Their origin had to be hidden behind a snappy name that was attractive in itself and had the additional capacity of giving the bearer a neutral appearance. To be sure, non-Jews from Slavic countries also often changed their names, but that was usually a matter of spelling and pronunciation rather than hiding one's identity.

The practice occasionally engendered strange effects. Long before Henry Kissinger became Richard Nixon's secretary of state, some members of his family had deemed the German family name to be detrimental to their ambitions and changed it accordingly. Henry, of course, proved that his name did not impede his fabulous success, which made his relatives' name-change rather inconsequential. Though they cherished their relationship with him, they were stuck with the change. They had jumped the gun and felt they could not go back.

In a recent issue of Shem Tov, the quarterly bulletin of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, there was a list of celebrities who adopted new names. Readers may be interested in a brief excerpt from a long list. They will find stage names first and the original Jewish names in brackets: Al Jolson (Asa Yoelson), Milton Berle (Milton Berlinger), Fanny Brice (Fanny Borach), Tony Curtis (Bernard Schwartz), Bob Dylan (Bobby Zimmerman), Ethel Merman (Ethel Zimmerman), Irving Berlin (Israel Baline), Beverley Sills (Belle Silverman), George Burns (Nathan Birnbaum), Danny Kaye (David Daniel Kaminsky), Eddie Cantor (Edward Israel Iskowitz), Jack Benny (Benjamin Kubelsky), Woody Allen (Allen Stewart Konigsberg) and Peter Lorre (Lazlo Lowenstein).

The list goes on and on. I will conclude it with the recently deceased Victor Borge, whose Jewish name was Borg Rosenbaum.

Fortunately, the custom of name-changing has greatly diminished in our day, but it still exists here and there as a sign of Jewish insecurity.

Bringing back the dead

"There is something about poverty that smells like death," wrote Harlem Renaissance writer Zora Neale Hurston, who had known both poverty and fame.

The Talmud put it succinctly: "A poor man is like a dead person."

"Poverty," wrote Jim Torczyner in his 1995 study of Jews in Vancouver, "is not just the absence of money. Poverty is the absence of power, an inability to influence the conditions which affect one's life."

When you are poor, you are, to all intents and purposes, dead. You can influence nothing about your life; you watch your children go hungry. You experience constant anxiety about where you will live, what you will be able to eat, what clothing you can provide. Welfare strips away your dignity.

Jenn M. Gerber in Vancouver

A popular perception is that there are two kinds of poor people: those who deserve help, and those who do not – called "the undeserving poor" by the Victorians. Shiftless, unable to care for themselves or their families, they were punished for their poverty. Readers who know the book or the movie Angela's Ashes recall her humiliating appearances before the gawking public to beg help for her starving and dying children.

On Jan. 28, Vancouver held a forum on poverty in the Jewish community. More than 200 people turned out to discover the faces of Jewish poverty. Figures based on the 1996 census were alarming: 17 percent of Jews live below the poverty line; 39 percent are single individuals; 35 percent are female single parents; 51 percent of new Canadians here for less than five years live in poverty.

The forum did not just quote statistics. We saw interviews of four people talking about their poverty and interviews with children at a local Jewish day school. The video Am I Still A Jew to You? challenged us to consider how we as individuals and as a community think about the Jewish poor. I paraphrase their stories:

A homeless young woman: "I live on the street. I beg. I flop at friends' houses. I want to study Torah, but I am homeless. How can I talk to you, my fellow Jews?"

A single mother of four: "When my daughter asks me at the supermarket, 'Can I buy a chocolate bar?' I say no. Then she asks strangers for money 'because we don't have any money to buy a chocolate bar.' How can we be part of a Jewish community?"

A middle-aged disabled man: "My career is gone. I don't look disabled, but I have lost my sight and my job. I am one of the can't do, can't see, can't join, can't afford."

A former school administrator: "I don't know how I came to this. If I spend $5 too much this week, I won't have enough till the end of the month. I had meals on wheels, but everyone saw this when the driver arrived in the lobby of my building; I am ashamed."

What's the cost of being Jewish: $7,000 for day school (with all the extras); $1,000 for summer camp; $4,000 for pilgrimage to Israel. And that's not counting the posh parties, gifts, clothes and weekends. Total: $12,000. Add synagogue dues of $1,200, plus a contribution to CJA, and the total can be $15,000. For one child and a connected synagogue family. For one year.

Poverty is like death. You die to a community. You disappear from the screen. You live in subsidized housing, if you have a house. You can't have a birthday party or bring in clowns and fire-eaters. You can't send your kids to youth conferences. You can't join a synagogue without revealing your poverty. You can never entertain or go out to a movie. You can't work if you are on welfare, and if you go off welfare you might end up earning less.

What do we do to bring back the dead? This forum has galvanized us to try as a community to create solutions that alleviate not only the poverty, but the stigma and shame of being poor. Now that we know about powerlessness, we have a chance to empower.

Or we can say, as one child did when asked, "Why do you think people are poor?"

Well, he shrugged, "That's life."

Let's hope not.

National unity what doctor ordered

What was unimaginable only a short time ago has come to pass: Ariel Sharon is the prime minister of Israel. His election victory was a testament to Ehud Barak's monumentally disappointing performance in his year and a half as prime minister. What happened here was somewhat obvious: While it appeared that a compromise with the Palestinians was possible, the Israeli people invested their trust in Barak – the person they believed could lead them to peace.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

When Barak's peace overtures were not only rejected by the Palestinians but were met by increasing violence, Israelis became disheartened and disillusioned. They came to believe that a real peace based upon mutual compromise was not possible at this time. Collectively depressed by this turn of events, they switched their support, in massive numbers, away from Barak to the only alternative presented to them– Ariel Sharon.

There is, however, some lingering doubt in the minds of the Israeli people and, consequently, there is very strong public sentiment in favour of a national unity government which would encompass Likud and Labour, as well as some of the religious and minority parties.

From a Canadian or American perspective, it is difficult to see how Sharon could govern without the backing of a unity government. After all, the Law Providing the Direct Election of the Prime Minister has destroyed the "Anglo/Canadian" model of responsible government upon which the Israeli parliamentary system was founded. (Indeed Sharon's party did very poorly in the last Knesset elections running well behind Barak's One Israel bloc.) And yet, the direct election law did not truly establish an American style "imperial" prime ministership with the checks and balances for which the American political system is famous.

A national unity government seems a good bet. Normally, I am opposed to such governments. In my view, a vibrant parliamentary democracy is based upon the constant vigilance of a "loyal opposition" that is prepared to confront and question the government at all times. Unity governments, first and foremost, confuse issues of political accountability.

Here's an illustration of what I mean. When we were on our first sabbatical in Israel in 1988, there was a minor outbreak of polio. It appeared that the cause was open and untreated sewage. A massive vaccination campaign for those under 40 was conducted. Which party should the voters hold accountable for what had occurred here? The environment minister was from one party and the public works minister from another; the health minister was from one of those parties, but could have even been from a third party. National unity governments can have a negative effect on democracy.

Nevertheless, a national unity government seems to be just what the doctor ordered. It is unlikely, given the differing perspectives of the parties, that a unity government could manage to negotiate a peace agreement with the Palestinians. Nonetheless, there is broad agreement that an end to the violence is a pre-condition to any peace settlement, and it may be possible for a unity government to arrive at a consensus on how the violence can be brought under control or, preferably, ended.

Furthermore, a national unity government would be somewhat reassuring to the West – particularly the U.S. government, the business community and North American Jewry.

Ever since the polls indicated a Sharon victory in the election, Jews in Canada and the United States have been bracing for another round of damaging publicity in the North American media. Actions by a unity government would be easier to defend. Further, a unity government with Likud and Labour might also be able to pursue the Zionist enterprise and forge a new consensus on the appropriate role of religion in the state.

Finally, given the disastrous consequences that have resulted from the direct election law, a national unity government should be able to assemble broad support for electoral reform. They can begin by scrapping the direct election law. More voting does not necessarily mean more democracy. Indeed, in Israel's case, democracy has been paralyzed.

Other reforms need to be considered as well. Israel's system of proportional representation has resulted in an electoral system wherein the members of the Knesset are not representative of, or accountable to, local populations. Consideration should be given to having one-quarter to one-half of the Knesset members elected from geographical districts (ridings) on a "first past the post" basis and the rest elected proportionally from national lists. This is only one idea and there are undoubtedly many more.

A national unity government will have been very useful if it brings about change in the electoral system.

The Kirshner File

Arthur Koestler – a life of the mind

Arthur Koestler bestrode his epoch like a colossus, a remarkably talented novelist, journalist, essayist and polemicist who personified the Jewish experience in 20th century Europe.

He wrote five major novels, one of which, Darkness at Noon, remains a classic; two piercing autobiographical volumes, Arrow in the Blue and The Invisible Writing; excellent books of reportage, notably Spanish Testament; and probing scientific and philosophical works such as The Lotus and the Robot and The Ghost in the Machine.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Like the Polish novelist Joseph Conrad, Koestler had a great facility for foreign languages. Switching from his native Hungarian to German at 17, he mastered English when he was not yet 30. And as his eclectic writings suggest, he possessed an uncommon knack for bridging the two cultures of humanities and science.

Despite his prodigious output, Koestler will always be associated with his bleak novel, Darkness at Noon (1940), the first concerted intellectual barrage against communism. Its impact may be compared to George Orwell's 1984. Both novels liberated untold numbers of people from the thraldom of a corrupt, totalitarian ideology. As a result, Koestler's intellectual influence was probably on a par with that of Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus.

And yet, 17 years after his death, he is not as well-known as he should be, writes David Cesarani, his latest biographer. Cesarani's thoroughly researched, felicitously written book, Arthur Koestler: The Homeless Mind (The Free Press), is an attempt to re-evaluate the man, to disentangle "the real Koestler from the mythic version he created." And it is the first work to make use of the Koestler Archive in Edinburgh University Library.

Born in Budapest in 1905, the son of middle-class Jews whose fortunes oscillated, Koestler was shaped by the political convulsions of the last century. By turns a Zionist Revisionist, a Communist, a Social Democrat and, finally, an unapologetic right-wing cold warrior, he was constantly being buffeted by the restless swirl and eddy of ideas.

Throughout his life, he was also torn between his Hungarian heritage and his Jewish background. Initially adapting Zionism as a response to anti-Semitism, he became an unreconstructed assimilationist with the birth of Israel in 1948. Consequently, he consistently downplayed his Jewishness, though he realized that it was an integral and transcending component of his mindset.

Koestler's mother, Adele, came from an eminent family in Prague, and his father, Henrik, a textile salesman, hailed from Miskolcz, a town northeast of Budapest. Cesarani debunks Koestler's assertion that he was raised in "an assimilated environment without roots in the Judaic tradition." In fact, he was brought up in an intensely Jewish social milieu crowded with Jews from Galicia.

In Vienna, where he says he spent the happiest years of his life, he studied engineering and physics and underwent the first of his ideological conversions. Neglecting his studies, he threw himself into Zionist activism, becoming a volunteer worker for the Jewish National Fund. He also accompanied Vladimir Jabotinsky, the Zionist Revisionist leader, on a speaking tour of Austria and Czechoslovakia. Unfortunately, Cesarani has little to say about his relationship with Jabotinsky.

Acting on his Zionist impulses, Koestler, in 1926, went to Palestine. There he toiled on a fledgling Hebrew newspaper, worked for an Arab architect, peddled lemonade, and sold advertising space for a magazine published by the Palestine Manufacturers Association. In 1927, Jabotinsky recommended him for a job as executive secretary of the World Union of Zionist Revisionists in Berlin. He resigned after eight months, fed up with the meagre salary. Thanks to a friend, and a modest track record as a freelance journalist, he was hired to be the Middle East correspondent for the Berlin-based, Jewish-owned Ullstein newspaper chain. This at the age of 22.

From an office in Jerusalem, he roamed the region, interviewing, among others, King Faisal of Iraq, and covering stories about Arab-Jewish tensions in Palestine. Koestler, however, grew increasingly tired of "the extremely complex reality" in Palestine. Called back to Berlin, he was appointed science editor. In 1931, he embarked on the greatest assignment of his career, coverage of the expedition to explore and map part of the Arctic from the vantage point of the Graf Zeppelin airship. He was rewarded with a further promotion, foreign editor and assistant editor of the mass-circulation Berliner Zeitung am Mittag. But in 1932, he was fired, having told management that he had joined the Communist party, locked in a bitter battle with Nazis.

Koestler respected the Communists for their "uncompromising radicalism," and believed that the Soviet Union presented a positive alternative to capitalism and bourgeois democracy. By contrast, Cesarani thinks that he embraced communism because he thought that it could resolve the so-called Jewish question. After being sacked, Koestler produced propaganda material for the Communists, amid the low-intensity civil war which wracked Berlin in the final phase of the ill-fated Weimar Republic.

At the invitation of a Soviet publishing house, he travelled by train to the Soviet Union in 1932. He found life there "terribly depressing" and was also disillusioned by the political infighting and backstabbing. Koestler met several leading Communist theoreticians, including Karl Radek and Nicolai Bukharin. Rubashov, the main protagonist in Darkness at Noon, was a composite figure of Radek and Bukharin, both of whom were purged by Stalin in the 1930s.

Arthur Koestler

Then Koestler – a ladies' man whose conquests were legendary – wrote the Encyclopedia of Sexual Knowledge, and burnished his reputation as a reporter during the Spanish civil war. With the outbreak of World War II, he fought for France and Britain. After being demobilized, he produced a series of radio plays on Nazi Germany for the BBC Home Service. In 1942, he attended one of the first public protests in London against Nazi atrocities, and met Jan Karski, a member of the Polish underground who had secretly visited the doomed Warsaw Ghetto.

From 1944 to 1949, Koestler was drawn into Zionist politics at the highest levels, meeting luminaries like Chaim Weizmann and Moshe Shertok. During this period, he played a role in the evolution of a plan, never carried out by the Allies, to bomb Auschwitz and Birkenau. He wrote Thieves in the Night, a novel of the struggle for a Jewish state, after visiting Palestine. During the course of his sojourn, he met the leading Jewish, Arab and British lights of Palestinian society, and seriously toyed with the notion of making aliyah.

During the 1948 War of Independence, he returned to Israel. He wrote Promise and Fulfilment, a book about Israel's statehood. But as Cesarani explains at length, his encounter with the new Jewish state was disastrous. He left Israel amid a welter of mutual recrimination and mishaps, never to go back again. In 1970, having focused his efforts on scientific and philosophic subjects, he rejected Menachem Begin's suggestion for a sequel to Thieves in the Night.

Nine years before his death, he wrote The Thirteenth Tribe, a controversial work resting on the questionable argument that the Jews of eastern Europe were descended from the Khazars, a tribe from the Caucasus.

Koestler, diagnosed with Parkinson's disease, committed suicide. But the manner of his departure from this vale of tears has not diminished his stature as an extraordinary person.

The sentence should have read: Certainly, he will have no alternative but to moderate his policies should the Labour party join a national unity government.

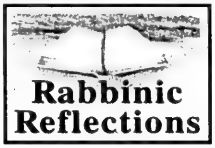
Jewish Life

Reclaiming our children

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN



A delegation of American rabbis travelled to Europe immediately after the Holocaust on a mission to visit the Catholic orphanages and reclaim the Jewish children who sought refuge through the Church during the war years.

This was not going to be an easy task. Because these children had arrived at such a young, impressionable age and were raised by Catholics, the majority of them had no recollection of their Jewish past.

To complicate matters even more, being wartime, there were no documents available to prove their Jewishness. Most of their parents had tragically perished in the Holocaust. Nevertheless, the rabbis were determined to rescue these children and return them to their rightful place in the Jewish community.

At one convent which was rumoured to have hundreds of Jewish orphans, the directors agreed that if the rabbis could prove the orphans' Jewishness, they would release the children to the Jewish community. The rabbis convinced the directors to allow them to meet the children at bedtime, at which time they would prove the Jewishness of the children.

At bedtime, the rabbis walked into the children's dormitories and, in the presence of the directors, recited aloud the bedtime prayer, "Shema Yisrael HaShem Elokeinu HaShem Echad." The children became hysterical. They shouted, "Mamma, Tatti, where are you? Are you there?"

The next day, hundreds of children were returned to the Jewish community.

In our generation, too, there are hundreds of thousands of children who have had no Jewish education and are being lost to assimilation and intermarriage. We, as a community, are responsible for finding these children and bringing them home. We too, must find the special place in their Jewish hearts. The indestructible core of the Jewish soul needs only the Shema Yisrael prayer to arouse it. If we can only succeed in igniting the flame of the soul, we will then succeed in stemming the tide of assimilation and bringing our children back home.

This theme is especially timely and meaningful with the upcoming Shabbat Shekalim, when we recall the annual community appeal of the "half shekel" in support of the temple service. According to many, the reason we were commanded to contribute a half shekel and not a full shekel is to teach us that every Jew is only one half without the contribution of a fellow Jew. You need two Jews to complete the coin.

Our sages tell us "Kol Yisrael areivim zeh lazeh" – Jews are responsible for each other. We must search and find a partner to complete our coin. Parshat Shekalim teaches us that we are incomplete until we have helped our fellow and made him or her an active participant of the community. Only when all the children of our generation, childlike in the usual sense or in terms of their knowledge, have been inspired to become active partners in the Jewish community by living a wholesome Jewish life, have we fulfilled our duty.

Finding the missing children of the Holocaust and bringing them home was done with great zeal and brought great results. Finding the children of our generation, however, will only be accomplished when we recognize the parallel.

Non-patriarchal eyes for Torah

The Women's Torah Commentary*, Edited by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Jewish Lights Publishing $44.95.

There is little halachic objection to having woman serve as rabbis. In his authoritative work, The Jewish Religion, A Companion, Rabbi Louis Jacobs writes, "Traditionally, the rabbi's function is to render decisions in Jewish law, and if a woman is competent to do so there appears to be no reason why she should not exercise this function." Some Orthodox leaders maintain, however, that to have woman serve as rabbis is "contrary to the Jewish spirit."

Maimonides, usually liberal in his approach to tradition, is almost alone among Jewish teachers in the Middle Ages to assert that a woman cannot hold any position of trust in the community.

Although woman were discouraged from Talmudic study (the second century sage, Rabbi Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, insisted that to instruct a woman in the law is like teaching her blasphemy), a significant number have become esteemed scholars and teachers.

Over the past three decades, women have been ordained as Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist rabbis and now serve in congregational and communal life. Their influence has been profound and many-sided. They have brought to Judaism fresh insights, enhanced sensitivity, increased civility and novel and unhackneyed interpretations of Torah.

In this book, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Director of Kolel, the Adult Centre of Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto, has solicited and edited 54 homiletical essays on the weekly Torah portions for the entire year. As one might expect, the submissions differ widely in style and interpretation. Many are frankly feminist in outlook – others, less so – but almost all of them make extensive use of Midrashic material and rabbinical commentators, both ancient and modern. With considerable success, they read the Torah with non-patriarchal eyes.

As Rabbi Goldstein explains in her brief introduction to the book, "We accept that the text as we have received it can be re-read and understood in a new light. We uncover, recover and discover. We explore, suggest and speculate."

In these rich and engaging essays, the rabbis teach that Eve was not guilty of the sins attributed to her, that Lot's daughters committed incest only to preserve a future for humanity, that Sarah would have not submitted so meekly to God's command to sacrifice her son, that Miriam was the first individual in the Torah to be called a Prophet because she convinced her parents to stay together despite Pharaoh's threats of death to all newborn boys.

Reacting to the parshah that contains the dietary laws, one rabbi discusses eating disorders among Jewish women. She reveals that the pressures to make a good first impression on an arranged date have led to "shidduch pressure," with young Orthodox girls starving themselves so they'll be more presentable.

This book, a major contribution to modern biblical commentary, includes brief biographical sketches of the contributors, a helpful glossary and an ample section of suggested books for further reading. Even the most skeptical male will find this inspiring and informative compilation an enlightening and eye-opening experience.

Jewish Life

Taking secular seriously

Guest Voice

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE

Uh-oh. My world-view is in trouble again.

The challenge this time? The secular Judaism movement, with its seemingly-contradictory claim: atheistic spirituality in a Jewish cultural setting. I've always agreed with Elie Wiesel that "the Jew may love G-d or fight with G-d; he may not ignore G-d," and I had my own reasons to be suspicious. Far from being a new sun on the Jewish horizon, this modern movement actually descends from the Communist Judaism of my paternal zaide.

Pitted against my mother's Conservative background, his legacy made religion an uneasy subject in our home. The ironic result of my father's universalistic upbringing was a hollow "Jews vs. the world" cynicism, and while my mother taught us liberal Judaism, he skipped shul and spouted anti-Christian rhetoric.

Struggling to define Judaism as more than just "not-Christianity," I became a baalat tshuvah (returnee to traditional practice), clucking over the hypocrisy of the non-Orthodox, those who wouldn't act on their Jewish convictions. But gradually, I began to realize that their contribution mattered as much as mine. My liberal background resurfaced, and with dialogue and study, my Jewish world expanded.

But not completely. I still saw myself as part of, if not a united Orthodoxy, then an elite of religious Jews, an "us" firmly opposed to "them" – apathetic, secular Jews. At least, until recently, when I could no longer ignore these new people spelling "secular" with a capital "S" and saying it like they really mean it.

But had the movement really changed? Way back when, my dad attended a Communist "cheder" where he learned… well, a little more than his sister, who, given the choice of Jewish school or ballet, picked ballet. What little girl wouldn't?

Today's leaders, though, are adamant that "secular" means more than just bagels-and-lox Judaism. Eva Goldfinger, spiritual leader of Toronto's Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, insists that the secular emphasis on personal responsibility can lead to a stronger, more committed Judaism.

"Never mind what your parents believed in," she counsels those seeking to build a Jewish lifestyle. "What elements are really vital for you?" Rededication to adult Jewish practice offers new spiritual energy to many estranged Jews.

Where secular organizations of the past, like my dad's "Jewish school," sought to abandon Jewish observance, today's movement has done an about-face. Holidays, baby namings and B'nai Mitzvah celebrations are now celebrated with pride. There is a reverence for ritual here which might have surprised the old-timers.

Almost painfully, I'm forced to admit that I can't see the "us and them" anymore. Secular Jews value Judaism and they're passing it on to their kids. And so, I have had to learn a new phrase: "serious Jews."

"Serious Jews" don't consider themselves religious, but, like the rest of us, they wrestle with the ancient responsibility of our heritage. And the energetic way they're doing it speaks volumes about how the movement has changed since my zaide's day.

There have been some changes in my parents' home, too, in recent years. Saying Kaddish for his parents, my father taught himself Hebrew; at age 57, he visited Israel for the first time. Like the movement that raised him, he is growing up now, becoming a serious Jew – a Jew-in-progress – which is, in the end, all any one of us can say.

More Jewish humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, I continue my look at the best of Jewish humour on the Internet.

First, a look at why Jews have embraced humour. One of the best experts is Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, author of Jewish Humour: What the Best Jokes Say About the Jews reviewed in the South Florida Sun-Sentinel [www.sun-sentinel.com/freetime/daily/detail/0,1136,6500000000081667,00.html].

In his book Rabbi Telushkin tells this joke: A group of retirees meets in a Tel Aviv coffee house to discuss the world's problems. One of them announces: "I'm an optimist."

Another asks: "Then why do you look so worried?"

Answer: "You think it's easy to be an optimist?"

Rabbi Telushkin explains: "Jews hold a hope against hope, a realization that life is filled with responsibility and that we should laugh… Jews are optimists with worried faces."

Judaism has valued humour for centuries. Rabbi Telushkin relates a talmudic story about Elijah visiting a marketplace. A rabbi, recognizing the prophet, asks who is destined for the life to come. Elijah points out two jesters.

"There's a holy power to humour," Rabbi Telushkin says. "It's healing. It can keep us from becoming fanatics. It makes us recognize imperfections. And when something bad happens, humour keeps us from feeling that the bad is the only reality."

If you would like to listen to some humour in the mameloshen, you're in luck. JewishMusic.com offers generous Yiddish excerpts of classic routines from masters like Dzigan & Shumacher, Shmulik Segal and Mike Burstein [www.haruth.com/YiddishHumor.html].

Speaking of Yiddish, we all know that many of that language's words have enriched the English language. Someone has taken the time to search all the words in the Oxford English Dictionary with "Yiddish" in the etymology field and has come up with more than 100, including heimish, narrischkeit, tchotchke, zaftig and glitzy [liberty.uc.wlu.edu/~hblackme/oed/yiddish.html].

But I particularly like a list of words in "Yinglish" or "Yidlish." These words sound like they came from Yiddish but really are English [rtt.colorado.edu/~biasca/fake_yid.html]. Some examples: bedridden, boxkite, conniption, epistle and farfetched. (Try them out loud!)

Lovers of poetry will be familiar with haiku, three-line Japanese poems usually composed of five, seven and five syllables. Well, David M. Bader has performed a bit of cross-cultural pollination in his Haikus for Jews (For You, A Little Wisdom) [www.extremely.com] with some more samples at [www.uta.fi/FAST/US1/REF/yidhum.html]:

Is one Nobel Prize so much to ask from a child after all I've done?

Shatner and Nimoy observing Shabbat – "Scotty, beam up a minyan."

Seven-foot Jews in the NBA slam-dunking – my alarm clock rings.

If you crave more Jewish humour, try the Mishmash Jewish Humor Collection [members.tripod.com/~jewish jokes/] and visit what is probably the best (and best-named) site around – Harry Leichter's Large Collection of Clean Jewish Humor [www.haruth.com/jhumorlink.htm].

Do you have a joke to share or would you like to get a regular supply in your mail box? Subscribe to an e-mail list and the jokes will be delivered to you on a regular basis [www.jhumor.com/newsletter.php3]. Or you can take your chance on a random joke from jHumor.com [www.jhumor.com/rand.php3]. Every time you click on that link, a different joke will appear on your screen. (The jokes that I looked at seemed OK, but remember, you never know what will turn up on your screen.)

I started this column looking at the past. But what about the future? The concept of tshuvah has been with us for thousands of years. But could technology change the way we atone for our sins? (For example, the age-old practice of placing notes into the cracks of the Western Wall has received a high-tech remake and is now open to anyone with access to the Internet [www.kotelkam.com/prayers.htm].)

Communities to join for month of learning

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Technology and tradition are coming together for a month of Jewish learning in North America.

In talmudic times, students would assemble during the month of Elul and Adar to learn together. This custom was known as yarchei kallah (months of gathering).

Next month, in the Hebrew month of Adar, the Jewish Community Centers Association and New York's 92nd Street Y will present Kallah: The Gathering in celebration of Jewish learning.

For the first time ever, Tiana Koffler Boyman said, technology will be used to bring Jewish adults together for a month of interactive learning opportunities with American and Canadian scholars.

Koffler Boyman, the new president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, said that 31 Jewish communities will be involved in a three-part lecture series which will present the cutting edge of Jewish dialogue.

Each lecture will feature live broadcasts of such scholars as Elie Wiesel, Alan Dershowitz, Dennis Prager and Anne Roiphe from New York's 92nd street Y.

At the same time, Canadian experts Seymour Epstein, Rachael Turkjenicz and Sara Horowitz will moderate discussions in Toronto. Participants will be able to interact with the speakers and other North American Jewish community centres, including Calgary, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Ottawa.

Elie Wiesel

Based on the theme l'takein u l'kadeish (to transform and to elevate), the lecture topics will include The Future of North American Jewry; Great Jewish Thinkers, Great Wisdom; and An Evening with Elie Wiesel.

Each evening should be very exciting, said Koffler Boyman. "I'm especially looking forward to the lecture on great Jewish thinkers.

"I imagine a very heated and lively debate over the role of our past sages and how they would feel about present issues."

For more information, call the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre 416-636-1880 #271 or the Bloor Jewish Community Centre 416-924-6211.

Paula: My mother Yetta has survived two strokes and three heart attacks.

Yetta: But I can still make a good chicken soup!*

Paula: Today she has some memory problems, swallowing difficulties, and she can't move around like she used to.

Yetta: I had a circle of friends for many years. Now there is no more circle.

Paula: Most of her friends have died. Some have gone into retirement homes. Mom still lives on her own.

Yetta: I don't make new friends quickly. I can't push myself, I'm more reserved.

Paula: We were a very small family to start with. Then, my brother Allan died quite suddenly four years ago. Soon after, my mother started to slide both mentally and physically.

Yetta: He used to visit me all the time. Then I talked to him one night on the phone — the next day he was gone.

Paula: Because Mom's functional ability was deteriorating, her doctor suggested that she go to Baycrest's Day Hospital for some rehabilitation. While there, the staff suggested that she should try Baycrest's Adult Day Program. She was spending too much time alone.

Yetta: I want to be around people. I don't want to just sit at home and look at the four walls.

Paula: Mom needed a structured program that was both stimulating and interesting.

Yetta: As soon as I walk in, I have so many choices. I can sit in all sorts of discussions like current events, wellness and the women's group. Or I can paint or draw or sing. Whatever I want to do, I'll go and try.

Paula: She goes on Monday and Wednesdays.

Yetta: I've even made some really good friends.

Paula: My mother is in her nineties now. Baycrest's Adult Day Program is the highlight of her week.

'Barak a great disappointment to most Israelis', says Tel Aviv professor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ehud Barak, Israel's outgoing prime minister, went beyond the national consensus by offering the Palestinians concessions on three key issues, claims an Israeli expert on the peace process.

Soundly defeated by Ariel Sharon in the Feb. 6 election, Barak offered too much on Jerusalem, the Temple Mount and the Palestinian refugees, Aharon Klieman said in an interview.

Klieman, Nahum Goldmann professor of diplomacy at Tel Aviv University, claimed that Barak violated Israel's national consensus by raising the idea of dividing eastern Jerusalem and splitting it into separate Jewish and Arab neighbourhoods.

In addition, he added, Barak mulled over yielding Israel's claim to sovereignty over the Temple Mount and of compromising over the "right of return," the Palestinians' demand that their refugees be permitted to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

"Barak did not make his red lines explicit," said Klieman, who has written books on Israel's peace talks with the Palestinians.

"He moved [the red lines] further back and encouraged the Palestinians to press for more concessions."

However, he acknowledged, some Israelis were willing to pay a high territorial price on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip for the sake of achieving a lasting settlement with the Palestinians.

Asked whether Barak had made any contributions to the peace process, he replied, "I'd be hard-pressed to say so. He was a great disappointment to most Israelis."

Klieman, here under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, said that Sharon wants to appear as a peacemaker, but under different terms.

He expressed doubt whether the Palestinian leadership will accept Sharon's reported objective of a non-belligerency agreement.

Whether bilateral negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority resume depends on the "general atmospherics" and the kind of government Sharon is finally able to establish.

Most Israelis desire peace, but not at any price, said Klieman.

Neither do they want talks to proceed while the current Palestinian violence in the territories rages.

Klieman, who is not identified with any political party, said he has "serious reservations" whether the PA really accepts Israel's existence.

Palestinian leaders, he charged, have not prepared their people for reconciliation.

Certain Palestinian elements wish to intensify the Palestinian uprising, notably Hamas and Fatah. Klieman said he does not know whether PA President Yasser Arafat himself favours escalation.

Playing down the prospect of a Mideast regional war touched off by the intifadah, he said that neither Egypt nor Jordan seek a war with Israel.

An authority on Israel's bilateral relations with Jordan, Klieman said that they have mutual security interests. "There is more co-operation than meets the eye."

In his estimation, Jordan prefers to maintain the status quo in the area, and King Abdullah II wants to continue his late father's legacy of friendship with Israel.

A student of Israel's arms exporting industry, Klieman said it is a very significant component of its economy, with more than $2 billion (US) worth of exports recorded last year.

In recent years, arms sales have shifted from the Third World to Europe, United States and the Far East, he noted.

Givat Haviva cultivates peace between Israeli communities

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite the crisis that is rocking Israel, Arab-Jewish dialogue must continue, says the director of the Institute for Peace Research at Givat Haviva Educational Centre.

"We do not have the luxury of giving up and waiting to see what will happen," said Sarah Ozacky-Lazar at a recent panel sponsored by Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva.

Ozacky-Lazar, also co-director of Givat Haviva's Jewish-Arab Centre for Peace, shared the panel with Mohammad Darawshe, spokesperson for Givat Haviva, and moderator Lipa Roth, president of Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva.

Givat Haviva is one of the oldest and largest centres promoting dialogue between Israel's communities.

In 1949, about 160,000 Palestinian Arabs chose to stay in Israel after the borders between Israel and her Arab neighbours were agreed upon, she said.

"Fifty-two years later, many Jews – both officials and the 'man on the street' – are still wondering how we should treat the minority among us."

This is not just a security issue, she said, "but an issue of democracy. The minority belongs to our enemy, but they are also part of the State of Israel."

There is a long history of problems in the relationship between the two communities, she said. "On the one hand, the Palestinians were granted full citizenship; from the beginning there were three Arab members in the Knesset, and today there are 12.

"A lot of steps have been taken, however, to control the Palestinians, including the confiscation of a vast amount of land.

"As well, 17 percent of the country's population finds itself in a contradictory position. They belong, at the same time, to the Palestinians and to Israel. This community is marginal in Israeli and in Palestinian society. They are not part of the Palestinian parliament or its leadership, and they are not part of the Palestinian struggle for independence. This causes a crisis in identity."

They are in a unique situation that many Israeli Jews do not understand, she said.

Overall, though, the two communities have maintained a reasonable relationship, said Ozacky-Lazar. "It is not a love story, but it is the story of two communities in the same country who have built an economy."

Darawshe, who spoke in Canada about 15 years ago, said that since then "nothing has seriously changed. Infant death amongst Palestinians is still three times the national average, the unemployment rate is three times the national average and 25 percent of the student population receives seven percent of the education budget.

"These are not the rules for a true co-existence. There cannot be peaceful co-existence between a horse and a rider; only one is doing his job, and the other is enjoying the ride. This has been the case for the last 52 years. We get our food on the table but we are not equal."

He called the Arab citizens of Israel "orphans as a result of the accident in 1948. We lost the people who ended up being displaced, and we are without a serious backbone.

"Many Arabs have looked upon us as traitors for accepting citizenship and staying home. They feel that if we were true nationalists, we would leave the country and then fight to get back."

In 1948, he said, Arabs owned close to 50 percent of the national land. "We now own less than three percent. The Israeli electric company has 13,000 employees, 50 of whom are Arab."

People who should know better, people who know what discrimination and racism means, are doing something seriously wrong, he said.

On the positive side, however, Darawshe said, Israel is a democracy, "and that ensures freedom of speech. That is the mechanism that will improve the state. It gives me hope that there is something to work toward.

"We cannot talk about co-existence, though, in the present reality. The country has to learn to deal with one-fifth of its population. We are home, and we would rather die than be refugees."

If the two groups are destined to live together, he said, "then we must start somewhere. At Givat Haviva, it is not a matter of whether or not a person is Israeli. The question is what kind of Israeli."

Every year, he said, 25,000 Jewish and Arab children come to programs at Givat Haviva and meet for the first time.

"Many come with [prejudices] that make them hate each other, and often the first meeting is an explosion. But then they start talking, and they learn that human values matter."

Ozacky-Lazar said that in the four months since the current crisis began, their office was flooded with calls from people from both communities who wanted to understand what was happening, and what went wrong.

"These calls were from people who never thought about the issue. Sometimes when something dramatic happens, people begin to realize they were not paying enough attention.

"We can use this moment of crisis to start a new way [of life]. We can build a different kind of society through educational programs, research, teacher training, and by conducting dialogue."

Givat Haviva, she said, is preparing people for the day when there will be political agreement. "We are cultivating and preparing the next generation for an era of peace."

Scholar says science, Torah compatible

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Current scientific research has proven clearly that the story of creation in Genesis is true, asserts Nathan Aviezer, professor of physics and chair of the department of physics at Bar-Ilan University.

Aviezer was speaking at Shaarei Shomayim congregation at a program titled On Contradictions Between Torah and Science: the Creation of the Universe, sponsored by the synagogue and Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University.

This scientific proof, though, does not negate the theological belief that God was ultimately responsible, he said.

"Science is not built to answer the question of who flicked the switch."

Aviezer quoted the world-famous cosmologist Stephen Hawking, an avowed atheist, as saying in his book A Brief History of Time, "Actual creation lies outside the scope of the known laws of physics. There is no scientific explanation."

At first blush, Aviezer said, the biblical creation stories seem "completely irrational. Every verse is contradicted by the most elementary scientific knowledge."

> All the details of the seven day creation of the world have been proven

"For centuries," he said, "cosmologists – those who study the creation of the universe – believed in its eternity, in line with the steady state theory, that what was in the past will be the same in the future." In other words, they believed that the universe has always existed, and will always exist.

Then, Aviezer said, in 1946, George Gamow, a Russian Jewish scientist, came up with the theory of time zero, when the universe suddenly sprang into being, with an enormous ball of light, what is commonly known as the big bang theory.

According to Gamow, Einstein's theory of relativity says that just as matter can be transformed into energy, energy, under the appropriate conditions, can be transformed into matter.

At this point, atoms and molecules didn't exist, but only plasma, a gas which "traps light and prevents its propagation."

At that point, according to Gamow's theory, at ".001 in time, the plasma was transformed into atoms. The light shone freely and filled the universe. This had nothing to do with sun – only the big bang," said Aviezer.

Gamow's theory, Aviezer said, was totally ignored. That is, until the technological advances and developments of the 1960s and 1970s.

New instruments and mathematical discoveries could detect and analyse radiation and light with great precision. These researches "without the slightest doubt proved Gamow's theory of the big bang."

Indeed, he said, all the details of the seven day creation of the world have been proven, including the time scale. (The difference in time between the ball of light, at time zero, and the transforming of plasma into atoms at time .001, Aviezer said, is only 15 minutes.)

Aviezer translated this into biblical terms. Reading from Bereshit, he said, the first chapter of the book of Genesis, the phrase vayehi or (and there was light), coincides with the sudden appearance of the enormous ball of light at time zero, the light separating from the darkness, in turn coinciding with the plasma changing to atoms, thus allowing the creation of life.

Nevertheless, Aviezer pointed out, all this does not affect the behaviour or the beliefs of religious Jews.

"We don't observe the mitzvot because we agree with the story of creation – we observe them because we accept the yoke of Torah."

In reply to a question from the audience as to whether there might be another theory of creation in 50 years as is wont to happen with scientific explanations, Aviezer said that the big bang is "the first scientific explanation [of creation]. It is based on hard evidence. Before, there was only speculation."

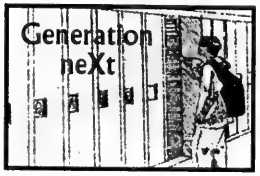
Basketball tournament helps build bridges

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.



If four people can have nine different opinions, then imagine the challenge of a Jewish nation when it is as logistically tiny as it is genetically talkative.

As children we are taught to accept others, regardless of their differences. As students, we are encouraged to listen to others even if we promise to never agree with them. And as young adults, we are instructed to accept ideas even if they contradict every opinionated fibre of our adolescent souls.

But the older we become, the more intimidating the barriers of observance, tradition and culture appear, and soon, the idea of tolerance becomes less tolerable than it seems.

For centuries, the Jewish take on tolerance has been at the forefront of intellectual thought, and while some seek solace in philosophical reflections, to many members of Toronto's Jewish community, modern demands include practical applications of such abstract ideas.

Alan Levine, a Grade 11 student at Westmount Collegiate Institute, a public high school in Thornhill, said that "what we need right now is less talking and more doing. We have to start listening to each other a little better."

Maybe Rabbi Natan Kandler was listening when he moved back to Israel last summer and opened The Tolerance Institute in Tel Aviv – an organization established to create programs promoting acceptance among Jews.

When I was speaking to Rabbi Kandler, a former teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) about his experiences, he said that, "Teaching in Canada has taught me to tolerate people I normally wouldn't agree with... You must realize that Canada is a special place to teach tolerance – people are very good at taking initiative when they feel it is necessary."

In fact, perhaps the best testament to our collective determination is this year's addition of educational activities to the annual Israel Becker Basketball Tournament; a tournament where hundreds of students from across North America play basketball at CHAT and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Named after Israel Becker, a CHAT graduate (1988) who was killed in a car accident, the four-day tournament is being structured this year to focus on the importance of building bridges over the schisms that divide us. Students, coaches and rabbis will join together to talk about tolerance, learn about the increasing necessity for open-mindedness, and devise prospective solutions to global dilemmas. Somewhere in between, they might even play some basketball.

Michael Wagman, a senior student at CHAT, and the chief programmer for this year's tournament is excited about the prospects of, what he has termed, The Tournament for Tolerance. Working alongside staff members and fellow students, Wagman said that "there is no better way to teach tolerance, than to practise it by example. Whether you come from a yeshiva in New York, or a co-ed high school in Chicago, we're all here to learn about ourselves, and about each other. I can't think of a better way to practise patience than to play basketball with people you might never have spoken to otherwise."

So, if you think four people with nine different opinions is entertaining, then you are personally invited to visit the tournament's Web site for the gory details of 600 players and 1,300 ideas. After all, if acceptance is hard work, then basketball is probably a good start at a good, maybe even tolerable workout.

Women's voices lecture series launched

TORONTO — Darchei Noam Congregation is launching a four-part lecture series beginning Feb. 28 called Women's Voices in Jewish Literature.

The series is partially funded by a Yad Mordecai Keren Torah grant from the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation, which seeks to develop adult learning.

The lecturers, all Toronto scholars, will "explore Jewish texts, from the sacred to the secular, searching for the voices of women, whether those voices are muffled, recessive or distinct," say organizers.

On Feb. 28, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, will talk about Beyond the Stereotypes: Women in the Bible You Knew – and Never Knew.

March 7, Tirzah Meacham, associate professor in the department of near and Middle Eastern civilizations at the University of Toronto will speak on Women's Perspectives in Talmudic and Rabbinic Literature.

Ruby Newman, professor of humanities, women's studies and Jewish studies at York University will discuss Fiction and Poetry by Israeli Women: The Personal and the Political, on March 14.

On March 21, Frieda Forman, a teacher, writer and scholar in the fields of Jewish studies and women's studies for over 40 years, and a founder and co-ordinator of the Women's Educational Resources Centre at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at U of T, will speak on Their Stories, Our Stories: Yiddish Women Writers.

All lectures begin at 8 p.m. in the Darchei Noam sanctuary, 15 Hove St.

The Public is Invited to join us.

Festival of Jewish creativity comes again to Toronto

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Painting, poetry, photography, film, music, theatre, comedy, story-telling and dance – all will be featured in the upcoming Colouring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Creativity. With over sixty young artists from across Toronto and parts of Canada and the U.S. participating, it's no wonder festival director Sarah Zelcer uses the word "eclectic" to describe the event.

Jewish Campus Services (JCS) will be presenting the fourth-annual festival from March 5th to 7th at the Tranzac Club, in Toronto's Annex neighbourhood. While visual art will be displayed throughout, each night of the festival has been designated to a particular arts category: the film and video screenings are on Mon. March 5th. Tues. March 6th will be the theatre, dance and spoken word presentations, and Wed. March 7th will be an evening of musical performances.

The organizers have produced a full lineup. According to Rena Kesten, a University of Toronto student and one of the visual arts organizers, sculpture, pottery, photographs, digital art, painting, sketches and even a tile mosaic will be on display.

The films being featured "run the gamut from documentaries to experimental works, dramas as well as comedies," says U of T student Meny Grauman, one of the organizers of the film/video evening. "These films are very original… [but also] widely accessible."

The second night of the festival will be devoted to prose and poetry readings as well as theatre, dance and monologue performances. Sarah Margles, a student at York University and staff educator with The Nesiya Institute, indicates that she and the other organizers of the spoken word evening have also compiled a literary magazine which will be launched in conjunction with the March 6th presentations.

Marisa Wardinger, a recent graduate of York University now teaching at USDS and one of the music organizers, says, "One can expect to hear [everything] from folk to jazz, experimental music to complex harmonies and even the memorable nigunim of Shlomo Carlebach" on March 7th.

According to Zelcer, a recent graduate of the University of Toronto and JCS' Arts and Culture Co-ordinator, the role of the thirty organizers, who have been meeting regularly since November, is crucial.

"There are so many people who are devoting their time totally voluntarily, and… that's the essence of what makes the festival…amazing."

"The process of organizing [is] a way to empower the students," she adds.

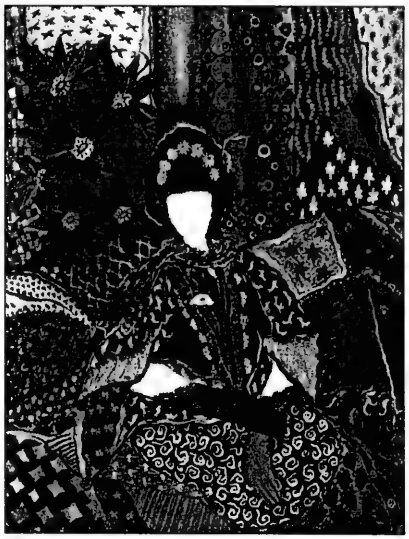
Besides collecting submissions, designing logos and posters, stuffing envelopes, distributing posters, selecting the featured artists and raising money, the organizers are also building a creative Jewish community as they get together before, during and after the festival for meetings as well as social events with the artists.

Zelcer says, "The festival is so largely about community. A big goal is… to give artists the opportunity to meet other artists… to give people who might not ordinarily want to be involved with programming or the Jewish community a chance to come out and let themselves shine."

She believes the festival is a "creative link" that connects everyone, but it is also, she explains, a "Jewish link" that runs throughout. Although the submissions were not necessarily required to have Jewish content, many of the artists chose to draw on their relationship to Judaism.

The multi-denominational artists and organizers are mostly between the ages of 19 and 26, when independent life is beginning and issues of identity and relationship to Judaism are very much in question.

"I think art really connects everyone because it's a means to express who you are," Zelcer explains. "And maybe in your day-to-day life it's harder to make [that statement] verbally… And then you have a painting, or a piece of writing, or a film, or a musical piece that really conveys all of those mixed emotions, those celebrations… and then you have people who can relate to that. It's special."



Woman Sitting on Pattern Pillows, a painting by University of Toronto student Davina Nathan, will be on display at Colouring Ourselves.

Colouring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Creativity runs from March 5th to 7th at the Tranzac Club (292 Brunswick Avenue). For more information, or to purchase tickets ($8), please call Jewish Campus Services at 416-785-1465, or check the festival Web site at www.jewishcampusservices.com.

Interior Wall Paintings, a painting by University of Toronto student Davina Nathan, will be on display at Colouring Ourselves.

Jewish law students meet in Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Students from Manitoba to McGill gathered in Toronto recently for the 14th annual conference of the Canadian Jewish Law Students Association (CJLSA).

The conference featured educational and networking components and brought together about 100 students to discuss "Jewish advocacy" work on behalf of organizations and student groups, according to Adam Aptowitzer, outgoing president of the CJLSA. The theme of the conference was Pursuit of justice; Jewish advocacy and advocacy for Jews.

Conference participants were treated to a keynote address by Antonio Lamer, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, a panel discussion on the media's coverage of events in the Middle East, a look at the issue of hate propaganda and free speech, presented by Toronto lawyer Edward Greenspan, and strategies to help lawyers participate in secular legal associations without compromising their faith.

In association business, Leigh Lampert was elected president of the CJSLA.

In a keynote address, Justice Lamer examined Canada-Israel legal ties from a personal, collegial perspective (there are numerous exchanges and visits involving Israeli and Canadian judges) and from a substantive/interpretive perspective.

Israel's Supreme Court makes frequent references to Canadian judicial decisions because of the similarities in protecting human rights "that one finds in Israel's Basic Law and our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But also, and of great importance [is] the enlightened thinking and the impact of the intellectual leadership of Chief Justice Barak," Lamer stated.

Barak has described an Israeli "constitutional revolution" that has followed the adoption in 1992 of the country's Basic Law, Lamer said. The Basic Law has given Israeli courts the tools to overturn legislation that infringes on human rights and it has evolved into a constitutional right that cannot be impinged by ordinary Knesset legislation – similar to Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

With the adoption of the Basic Law, "the legal scholars started scrutinizing my court's and also other Canadian courts' judgements under the Charter, and their interpretations by academe and reference in Israel to Canadian jurisprudence in the field of constitutional law became much more frequent," Lamer stated.

Lamer said Barak has worked to reconcile universal human rights with the application of traditional Jewish law. He called Barak's formulation on this point "the words of a very courageous and indeed enlightened person, a genuine Israeli."

Referring to Barak's work to promote human rights, Lamer stated: "God, I wish there were more Barak's around the world."

In other programs, lawyer Gary Gottlieb, a bencher with the Law Society of Upper Canada, told the conference that if Jewish lawyers are sincere in their beliefs, "colleagues will give you their respect.

"You need not abandon your religious beliefs in order to fit in," he said.

Gottlieb said he had persuaded the Law Society to provide kosher meals in its cafeteria and to reschedule its convocation from Saturday to accommodate his religious beliefs.

"We must fight for religious rights so as to participate in the Law Society's programs and meetings," he said.

Others who addressed the conference included Conrad Winn of the Compas polling agency; Drew Fagan, foreign editor of the Globe and Mail; Ezra Levant, editorialist with the National Post; Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, who participated in a panel on media coverage of Middle East events; Bruce Elman, dean of law at the University of Windsor; lawyer and humourist Marcel Strigberger; and Prof. Ernest Weinrib of the University of Toronto.

The CJLSA maintains chapters at universities from Winnipeg to Halifax and is planning to expand to campuses in Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver. The organization hopes to put in place a permanent mechanism that would assist Jewish lawyers to keep in contact, Aptowitzer said.

The conference was supported by sponsors in the legal community and by B'nai Brith Canada.

Students' blue bracelets show unity with Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish students have a new card up their sleeves to display their solidarity with Israel.

Well, not exactly a card. It's actually a blue bracelet.

As a gesture of Jewish unity and solidarity with the Jewish State, blue "bracelets" – actually blue shoelaces that have been cut up and double-knotted – are being distributed to and worn by Jewish students at Quebec and Ontario university campuses. Plans are to distribute them right across the country.

"We're wearing the bracelets to remind everyone that Israel stands for peace and that we stand for Israel," said Patrick Amar, a 22-year-old political science student at Concordia University.

Amar, who is also communications director and co-ordinator of Jewish outreach at the Hillel Jewish Students Centre's francophone branch, Centre Hillel, said the bracelets are being used to promote "awareness" among students among campus.

"Especially at Concordia," he added. The university has been the site of particularly proactive pro-Palestinian activities since the second intifadah began last fall.

The idea for the bracelets came during the recent weekend-long retreat at Camp B'nai Brith to devise strategies to fight the anti-Israel onslaught on campuses.

Amar said a focus group at the retreat – comprised of students from Montreal's McGill and Concordia universities, the University of Toronto, Queen's University in Kingston and McMaster University in Hamilton – embraced the concept.

On Feb. 6, the first day of the campaign, about 400 of the bracelets were handed out to students at McGill, Concordia, the Hillel House on Stanley Street and the Centre Hillel, with the intent to get them to all Montreal campuses.

Similarly, the Ontario universities are reporting that the bracelets "are taking off very well," Amar said.

The bracelets are reminiscent of the blue-and-white pins worn by students in 1975 to protest the United Nations' infamous "Zionism is racism" resolution, he said. The pins read: "Proud to be a Zionist."

The bracelets are also modelled after the red strings handed out at the Western Wall to visitors to remind them of the wall's frailty.

They are singed on the ends, Amar said, to symbolize the "eternal flame." In French, the bracelet is being called "fil de fierté," a "string" or "thread" of pride.

He said when students are approached to put on a bracelet, they are asked if they're Jewish, if they'd like to wear a bracelet, and if they feel it's something that should be worn.

Coast to Coast

Politicians are people too!

David Iftody, a former Liberal MP from rural Manitoba, died last week. Back in Ottawa, those members from all caucuses who worked with or knew him reacted with shock and sadness. It was reminiscent of the reaction following the collapse and subsequent death of Shaughnessy Cohen a couple of years ago.

No, this has not turned into a column devoted to political obituaries, but the above places into some context some otherwise surprising developments.

The two developments are Lucien Bouchard's recent resignation and Deborah Grey's volte face on the MP pension issue.

All of us political pundits waxed sombre as we laid bare the ideological and practical reasons behind the Bouchard resignation. And we all heaped generous doses of derision on Deborah Grey's decision to opt into the MP pension plan after having characterized it as a pig's feeding trough through her years as a Reform-then-Canadian Alliance MP.

Perhaps we spoke too soon. It is surely true that the Michaud affair jolted the former Quebec premier and equally true that he was growing unbearably weary of the constant battles he was forced to wage against the hard-line members of the Parti Quebecois. As for Grey, there can be no doubt that ten-plus years of denigrating Liberals and Tories as little more than pork barrellers left her exposed to criticism when she reversed her position on pensions.

However, we are guilty of ignoring the simple fact that politicians are people too.

Preston Manning and Alan Rock are both undergoing cancer treatment. Bouchard himself survived a life-threatening battle with a horrific disease. Is it so difficult to accept that from time-to-time politicians also succumb to the vulnerabilities and anxieties of simply being human? At the end of the day, Lucien Bouchard wanted to ensure that he had quality time with the family he so cherishes. His decision puts into practice a value that we claim is core to our societal beliefs – the centrality of family.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Deborah Grey, in the face of reminders of the fragility of life, chose to provide financial security for the family she so loves. Those decisions are worthy of our praise – regardless of the political hay we can make of them. She can indeed be faulted for having trivialized those same concerns held by the other MPs that gave rise to the government's pension plan. But we should not make the same mistake about her decision to secure the protection to which every Canadian family aspires.

Chinese-Jewish specialist stops in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — China is probably the last place you would expect to find a centre devoted solely to Jewish studies.

Yet Pan Guang, dean of the Centre for Jewish Studies in Shanghai, reports that there is a lot of interest in Jews, Judaism and Israel in parts of China. This is especially true in Shanghai because of the large Jewish refugee community that came there during the war.

As part of a North American tour, Pan stopped in Winnipeg on Feb. 7 to 8 to talk about his centre and the new book he has written, The Jews of Shanghai. The tour coincides with a travelling exhibit on the same subject, currently showing at Winnipeg's Jewish Heritage Centre until the end of March (covered in The CJN's Feb. 1 issue).

Pan's interest in the Jewish people was aroused early on in life; growing up in Shanghai, he had Jewish neighbours. His postgraduate studies in university were on the history of Europe and the Middle East with a particular interest in Jewish matters.

"We Chinese have a hard time understanding anti-Semitism and the Holocaust," he says, "although I have seen anti-Chinese sentiment in Singapore."

His research led him to study Zionism and Israel as well.

The Centre for Jewish Studies was opened in 1988. There had been some research done on the Jews of China prior to its opening, Pan notes, but it was all destroyed during the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s and '70s.

The Centre draws its researchers – professors and some graduate students – from Chinese universities. There are four main areas of research, Pan says. These include Jewish history, Jewish culture, contemporary issues – lectures on the Middle East are hot topics that draw over 100 people, he says – and Chinese-Jewish history. For the first three areas, the Centre is dependent on foreign sources, such as Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz's Talmud, that are translated into Chinese.

"We have some people who can read Hebrew," Pan says, "but no one who can read Yiddish. We have sent some students to YIVO in New York to study Yiddish because we have a lot of material in Yiddish."

Chinese-Jewish history is the Centre's main focus. Shanghai's Jewish refugees in the 1940s left a lot of written material. During the war, these Jews made up three diverse groups, Pan says. The Sephardim, who numbered about 1,000, came to Shanghai with the British in the first half of the 19th century. About 5,000 Russian Jews came initially to Harbin in Manchuria after 1881 to escape the pogroms in Russia. They moved south to Shanghai in the 1930s after the Japanese occupied Manchuria. An additional 25,000 German, Austrian and some Polish Jewish refugees came in the late 1930s to escape the Holocaust.

There are still about 200 Jews in Shanghai today and the community has an Orthodox rabbi, Pan says. In Hong Kong, there are 6,000 Jews and five congregations.

In addition to his work on Shanghai's Jewish community, Pan has studied the history of Chinese-Israeli relations and has written a book about the subject called Two Opportunities Missed. He notes that Israel was the first country in the Middle East to recognize the Communist government of China, yet the Korean War and the Cold War prevented the two countries from establishing diplomatic relations at that point.

After the Cultural Revolution, Israel and China began to draw closer together in the face of a common enemy in the Soviet Union. Bilateral trade grew considerably, mainly through Hong Kong, before the two nations recognized each other in 1992.

Pan received an award from the Canadian government in 1996 to help finance his research on the Jews of China. He has traced about 100 Canadian Jewish families whose roots go back to World War II Shanghai.

Pan's lecture tour began in Vancouver. After Winnipeg, he was headed for Ottawa before beginning a six-city tour of the United States, starting in New York.

PLO's anti-Israel diplomacy gets boost

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Alongside the violent intifadah in the territories, the Palestine Liberation Organization has been conducting a stubborn war against Israel in every international organization to which it belongs.

The Palestinian diplomatic struggle for international legitimacy – and Israel's diplomatic isolation – has never ceased, not even at the high points of the negotiations for a final settlement, but the intifadah has given new impetus to the efforts.

Yasser Arafat finds it easier to enlist support when the international media is broadcasting pictures of Israeli soldiers opposing Palestinian civilians. Israel faces several international challenges now that Ariel Sharon has become prime minister.

A UN Human Rights Commission committee visited the territories last week to find evidence of Israeli "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity."

The Palestinian Authority helped the three committee members who visited Gaza, Jerusalem, Ramallah, Hebron, Bethlehem and Beit Jalla. Israel boycotted the committee, refusing any cooperation, and will have to suffer a critical report next month that will be presented to the annual session of the Human Rights Commission in Geneva.

The Palestinians and their supporters in the Arab world are not forgoing any opportunity to bring up their case – and to denounce Israel's – in an international forum.

Habitat, the UN commission on human settlements, engaged in research into population growth and settlement around the world, opened last week in Nairobi.

At the instigation of Arab states, the issue of the Jewish settlements in the territories was added to the agenda under the heading, "the situation of Palestinian housing in the occupied territories."

According to a source in Jerusalem, the Nairobi conference will have as a background paper to its decision on the settlements, the latest report from the 32-year-old UN commission called the committee to investigate Israeli practices affecting the human rights of the Palestinians, with which Israel has never co-operated.

That report, issued in October 2000, said that "the strict implementation of laws and regulations by Israel creates fear and despair among the population of the territories. In a period of violence, this enforcement makes the lives of Palestinians and Syrians on the Golan Heights even more intolerable."

The Foreign Ministry is sending its deputy director general for international organizations, Mordechai Yedid, to Nairobi. His job will be to rebuff any decisions against Israel. The main argument of the Israeli delegation will be against "politicization" of a professional organization such as Habitat. According to the source in Jerusalem, the U.S. delegation is expected to back the Israeli approach.

Another channel where Arabs are working against Israel is the initiative to convene the signatories to the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949.

The convention forbids the transfer of populations to occupied territories and has for years been used as a central international argument that the Jewish settlements in the territories are illegal.

Israel refuses to apply the Geneva Convention on the West Bank and Gaza, arguing that they are not "occupied territories" as defined by international law, because except for a hiatus between 1949 and 1967, Jews had lived in those areas, and there is evidence of longstanding Jewish historical attachment to the places.

During Benjamin Netanyahu's tenure in office, Arab states raised the idea of convening the signatories to the convention to create "international protection" for the population in the territories.

The intifadah has now created an opportunity to revive the conference. On October 13, a little more than a week after the outbreak of the violence, the Arab League asked the Swiss government, which is entrusted with the Geneva Conventions, to convene the signatories.

The Swiss did as they were requested and asked the governments of all 180 nations signed to the convention to respond and if they had any ideas about where it should take place.

According to the source in Jerusalem, the United States, Australia and New Zealand all agree with Israel that the conference should not take place. The European Union will clarify its position this week and the Foreign Ministry believes the EU will also be opposed.

Labour, Likud meet as talks grow tense

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Labour and Likud party negotiating teams met last Sunday to discuss the allocation of ministerial portfolios in a unity government. They were also tackling a number of unresolved policy issues such as the law on deferring conscription for yeshiva students, and Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon's unwillingness to exclude the extreme right-wing parties from the government.

Labour sources said if these issues are not resolved to the satisfaction of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's representatives, Labour would not join the government.

Meanwhile, the Likud and Labour parties traded accusations against a backdrop of rising objections in Labour to the appointment of Barak as defence minister in the government of Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon.

Sources close to Sharon said the internal strife facing Barak was leading Labour to make new conditions and "invent difficulties in the negotiations" so as to delay the formation of a unity government.

With the difficulties facing Barak, Labour has delayed a convention of its central committee that was due to meet Tuesday to discuss the party's inclusion in the government. Labor sources said the central committee meeting had been postponed until next week.

"Barak is in fact signaling to us that if he is not the defence minister, Labour will not be in the unity government," sources close to Sharon said. But Labour sources charged that Sharon is the one trying to derail the unity negotiations.

According to Labour members involved in the talks, the Likud raised a new demand to include a clause stipulating that peace negotiations would be conducted by the Prime Minister's Office and not the Foreign Ministry, a clear swipe aimed at Shimon Peres.

Holocaust-deniers to meet in Lebanon

The ADL reports that on Jan. 19, 1998, "about 70 Palestinian professors, journalists and religious leaders protested in front of a French cultural centre in support of Garaudy. The Islamic Human Rights Commission, an Iranian activist group, and Al-Khaleej, a United Arab Emirates paper, also defended Garaudy."

Some of the most egregious anti-Semitic diatribes have been carried in Al-Hayat Al-Jadeda, the official newspaper of the Palestinian Authority. The paper has accused Israel of controlling U.S. decision-making, alleging that former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was "feverishly trying to recruit America and its allies to served the hated agenda of the Torah."

In another article, the Palestinian newspaper alleged the existence of "a greater Zionist plan which is organized according to specific stages that were determined when the Protocols of the Elders of Zion were composed."

(For a sampling of anti-Semitic materials in the Arab media, visit www.adl.org.)

Last May, at the IHR's 13th international conference in Orange County, Calif., 150 "revisionists and friends" gathered to discuss the Holocaust. The assembled delegates heard from members of the history falsification movement, including French academic Robert Faurisson, Toronto publisher Ernst Zundel and British writer David Irving.

This year, the Beirut meeting is being organized by Association Verité et Justice (Truth and Justice), a three-year-old Swiss organization headed by Jürgen Graf. Graf is "a prominent Swiss revisionist author who fled his homeland rather than serve a 15-month prison sentence for Holocaust denial." Graf "has been welcomed in Iran," states the IHR Web site.

This confluence of events – the meeting of Holocaust deniers, the conference location in the heart of the Arab world, the Iranian connection – worries Rabbi Cooper.

He has written to the Lebanese ambassador in Washington, asking that Lebanon block the conference, but so far, he has had no response.

Emerson, who has testified before a U.S. House of Representatives committee that held hearings on international terrorism and immigration policy, said there is "consistent use of neo-Nazi and Nazi propaganda in Islamic militant circles… Lately we see neo-Nazi cross-fertilization with radical Arab groups and even some mainstream groups.

"I think their hatred of Jews is so intense that it has led to these alliances," Emerson said.

A recent report in the Milan-based newspaper, Corriere della Serra, suggests the alliances may be heading to a new level. It cites German intelligence services, which claim Osama Bin Ladin has begun financing far-right groups throughout Europe to help him carry out attacks during a G-8 summit meeting that will be held in Genoa this summer.

The Western media, cowed by concerns over political correctness, have been "intimidated and bamboozled" into avoiding covering the links between the Muslim world and neo-Nazis, including on the domestic North American scene, Emerson said.

In Canada, meanwhile, the Arab language newspapers Al-Orouba and Al-Miraat have employed anti-Semitic stereotypes in the past (CJN, April 10, 1997), and a November 2000 edition of Al-Moustakbal, a Montreal paper, ran an article that referred to "our enemy, the Jews."

Sasson Mayer, an Iraqi-born Jew who monitors the Arab-language press, quoted the article calling for a "struggle against Jews… Our enemy [the Jews, in every place that there are Jews] is aiming to take our land."

Barak: 'No imminent Iraqi threat'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak met with security chiefs last weekend to discuss Friday's U.S.-British air strikes against Iraq.

Barak called the meeting, which included Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz and heads of military intelligence, after Iraqi President Saddam Hussein called the operation "a Zionist plot."

"Israeli citizens have no cause for concern," Barak said at the meeting, adding that there was no need for any special security measures. He said Israel would keep a close watch on developments in the Gulf and would remain in contact with the United States for updates.

The week in Israel

Feb. 12

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein told Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon that Tzachi Hanegbi and Avigdor Lieberman cannot serve as ministers in the government because of pending indictments against them.

Feb. 13

• The IDF have set up a defense line for the Tunnel Road to Gush Etzion. Palestinians regularly target Israeli motorists there. An Israeli motorist was recently shot and killed while driving on the road.

Feb. 14

• Sharon said PA President Yasser Arafat bears personal responsibility – failing to combat terrorism and fanning hatred for Israel — in the hit-and-run attack south of Tel Aviv in which eight Israelis were killed and 20 injured. The bus driver, a 35-year-old Palestinian, subsequently admitted to having planned the attack.

• The government decided to pay $4 million (US) in compensation to Sasha Elterman, an Australian athlete seriously injured when a bridge collapsed at the opening ceremony of the 1997 Maccabiah Games.

Feb. 15

• The IDF former chief medical officer denied Palestinian claims that the IDF has used nerve gas in the ongoing violence. Dr. Eran Dolev said pictures on Palestinian television purporting to show victims of Israeli nerve gas attacks were fabricated.

Feb. 16

• Bush administration officials who met with aides to Sharon agree with the prime minister-elect's position that it is not possible to reach a permanent settlement with the Palestinians now and efforts should instead concentrate on reaching a long-term interim agreement.

PA security in 'process of collapse,' Israelis claim

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli security officials believe the recent spiral of violence in the territories reflects Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's inability to control events there.

Last week's lethal bus terror attack, which claimed eight Israeli lives, along with the recent wave of violence in the territories, bear witness to a "process of collapse within the Palestinian Authority," the officials claim.

Though the attacks are not orchestrated by Arafat directly, the PA Chairman is doing little to prevent them, and inflammatory comments he and other top PA officials make encourage renewed violence, the Israeli officials contend.

Officers of the IDF identify a kind of competition between two PA strongmen in the West Bank: Fatah leader Marwan Bargouti and intelligence services head Tawfiq Tirawi have been vying with one another in an effort to spearhead violent strikes against IDF soldiers and settlers.

Meantime, Palestinian security forces are doing nothing to thwart terror strikes against Israeli targets, and several top PA security officials have been personally involved in planning such strikes.

High-ranking IDF officers who are currently deployed in the territories believe the political leadership must toughen the retaliatory measures it uses against the PA.

The officers contend the IDF will be able to flex more muscle in the territories once PA security men are classified as enemies, since such a redefinition would enable Israeli security forces to strike against these Palestinians at any time — and not only in retaliation for shots fired at IDF soldiers or settlers.

The IDF officers also want to receive clearance for entry into certain parts of the territories that are under full PA control.

Europe's media bash Israel

According to Reports

When we speak about the Canadian media we often mistakenly assume they are a monolith which operates in isolation, with one voice, especially where Israel is concerned. However, that picture is an oversimplification. It masks a more complex reality that Canadian media – both anglophone and francophone – consist of a plurality of voices and viewpoints.

To the oft-heard refrain in our community that the Canadian media are biased against Israel the reply must be: some are but many are not. There is more understanding of Israel's predicament than many of us may be aware of.

However, in our ever-shrinking world, there are important sources of influence beyond Canada's borders not friendly to Israel, which strongly affect attitudes in some media circles here.

High on the list for the English-speaking media are such publications as The Economist and The Guardian, both of which, from different political perspectives, tend to be very critical. Le Monde and Le Monde Diplomatique stand out for the francophone media.

The Economist's cover story of its Feb. 10-15 issue, "Sharon's Israel, The world's worry," tells the whole story – or most of it. The accompanying editorial goes on to suggest that while the world will be living under a dark cloud with Sharon in power, the sky may not fall in. What a relief! At the very least, The Economist contends, Sharon's rise to power spells the end of the Oslo peace process. It ignores the glaring fact that Arafat himself brought Oslo to a halt when he rejected the proposals at Camp David last summer and turned to violence as a substitute to diplomacy.

Not to be outdone, "Change for the worse," an editorial in the Feb. 8-14 issue of The Guardian commends Ehud Barak for moving his country further than any previous leader towards ending "its" war with the Arabs. It concludes: "Until Israelis, instead of running to hide behind the likes of Mr. Sharon, understand and accept once and for all the need to give ground and make amends, there will be no 'security,' no peace and no rest."

No editorial in a major Canadian daily quite ranks with this Guardian piece, which unfortunately is not atypical of the U.K. and Europe generally.

When we weigh how Israel is treated in the Canadian media, we should keep these foreign news sources in mind.

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Klezmorim film dispels the myths

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A lot of popular myths are shattered in The New Klezmorim, a film by David Kaufman shown at a recent Friends of Yiddish meeting.

The real klezmer music has its roots in the old Yiddish world of Eastern Europe and is not the kind of "assimilated" music played at many Jewish functions today, according to Alan Bern of Brave Old World, one of many musicians interviewed in the movie.

The New Klezmorim was filmed at KlezKanada over five days in the Laurentians north of Montreal in 1998.

The real klezmer musicians are those who "do not want Holocaust survivors to drift off in memories, but to face the world as it is today," said Hankus Netsky.

He was supported by other musicians, including Michaęl Alpert, who said, "Though Yiddish is not dead, I doubt if klezmer will survive if the language is not spoken."

Rather than embracing popular klezmer, the new Jewish music must be forward looking said Bern, who added, "We're it."

Also interviewed are three University of Toronto students, Reena Katz, Benjamin Gonshor and Benjamin Nemerofsky-Ramsay, who all say klezmer helps them get back to their Jewish roots. Katz said she studies Yiddish to understand what her grandmother thought.

Now people younger than 60 years of age are attending klezmer concerts, said Josh Waletsky, a Yiddish writer.

Explaining why he and other musicians had gone to Germany, Bern said the country spent "millions of dollars" on promoting Jewish music. "We have passionate supporters in Germany," he said.

Of their visit, Alpert said: "The future belongs to the children of yesterday's enemies."

Composer Zalman Mlotek said he grew up in a household where only Yiddish was spoken. But many non-Jews are now involved with klezmer, he said.

A documentary filmmaker since 1978, Kaufman, who lives in Toronto, was with CBC-TV for 15 years, working on The Journal and Fifth Estate. He is now working on two films for the Canadian History channel, Terror from the Skies, based upon the bombing of Guernica in 1937, and Kristallnacht, the Night of the Reich Pogrom.

Some of the Canadians in the film were Montrealer Sara Rosenfeld, president of the Yiddish Culture Foundation, and her son Moishe Rosenfeld, an actors' agent from Toronto; Ruth Schwerbel and producer Myrna Levine, both of Toronto; and Schwerbel's young son, Aaron, who plays the violin in the opening shots. Among those dancing the horah are Min Grossman and Judy Wineberg of Toronto's Friends of Yiddish.

Young girl's poems turned to songs

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Carla Hartenberger was in Grade 3, she wrote her first poem, Mother's Nighttime Hugs.

That became the first of many poems used by composer Chun Ka Nin as lyrics for Carla's Poems, a musical composition of eight scores.

The piece has already been performed in Japan, Edmonton and Toronto, and soon The Toronto Children's Chorus will present it as part of a benefit performance for the Hospital for Sick Children's music therapy program.

"It all started a few years ago when I gave Mrs. Bartle one of my poems after her father died," Carla, who is now 13, said.

Jean Ashworth Bartle is the musical director of The Toronto Children's Chorus, where Carla and her sister Laura sing.

"Mrs. Bartle was really touched and asked me if I had any more poems.

"I was being encouraged to write poetry by my teacher at school," Carla said, "so I began to give them to Mrs. Bartle as I wrote them.

"In the meantime, Mrs. Bartle began talking to Chan Ka Nin about composing a piece for the choir which would include children's poems. She showed him different ones and he liked mine the best."

Chan, who is an associate professor at the University of Toronto, said that "I was searching for a text to use for a Music Canada 2000 Festival project when Bartle showed me some of the poetry of 11-year-old Carla Hartenberger.

"Having two teenaged daughters myself, I had always wanted to write a piece which would give a voice to their generation. The poems were chosen and placed so that the structure of the piece would reflect the gradual maturing of a young girl in a world seen through her eyes."

Over the course of the year, Carla and Chan worked together to create the words and music to Carla's Poems.

"It was a great experience," Carla said. "Chan Ka Nin treated me like a colleague, not like a little kid. He would come over and ask me how I felt when I wrote the poems so that he could include all my feelings in the piece."

Carla was valedictorian of her 1999 graduating class. She is also a student of voice, piano and violin.

"It was an incredible experience to have been part of the premiere of Carla's Poems last spring," she said. "I really liked it when I got to go on stage, take a bow and they gave me flowers."

After the premiere, Carla went to Israel with her family to visit her grandmother, aunt, uncle and cousins.

"We did so much, went to so many places and learned so much about the country."

On March 3, the Toronto Children's Chorus and the Hospital for Sick Children Foundation will present Children Helping Children at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. Selections will also include the works of Ruth Watson Henderson and Srul Irving Glick. For ticket information, call 416-870-8000.

Shakespeare, slapstick style – and abridged

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On opening night of the zany comedy The Complete Works of William Shakespeare (abridged) at the Young People's Theatre (YPT), the audience was practically rolling in the aisles.

The play, written by Adam Long, Daniel Singer and Jess Winfield, was created as a palatable introduction to the massive body of Shakespearean works. Most of the 37 plays are breezily dispensed with in the first act, which includes highlights from Romeo and Juliet and Othello.

But in the second act, the actors perform an extensive re-enactment of Hamlet, encouraging audience participation with hilarious results. Then the actors perform it again. And again and again, to a dizzying frenzy. Then in an impressive finale, they do it once again – backwards!

"It's fun! This really keeps the guys on their toes, because they can't predict what the audience will do," Joel Greenberg, the play's director, says.

Greenberg cheerfully shares credit for the show's success with his actors.

"We have a very nice cast. Those three guys [Kirk Dunn, Stephen Guy-McGrath and Joel Harris] just never stop working. They have very good chemistry."

The slapstick production appeals to both children and adults. Greenberg feels that it's quite a compliment when nary a whine or a yawn can be heard from the spellbound audience.

"This type of theatre [is similar to] the world of burlesque," he says.

At a talkback session after a preview performance, one teacher who asked if there were two versions of the play, one for younger children, which there isn't.

"She was concerned because there's a lot of innuendo," Greenberg says. "But that was the only comment we had like that. The theatre is very clear that this show is for ages 12 and up. But I did remove about half-a-dozen bits that were very funny, [which] were clearly for an adult audience."

Greenberg says he's very happy to be back at the YPT after a nine-year absence.

"Every once in a while you're lucky to be part of a project that just keeps moving forward. This is exactly how I remember it being when I was there originally," he said.

"Although the people have changed, there is something about that building, and the audience they play to… it's a fabulous working environment. When I first began working at YPT, I had never done theatre for young audiences before and I stayed for over five years."

Greenberg, a Thornhill resident and a former Montrealer, has worn many professional hats, sometimes simultaneously, as a theatrical director, actor, playwright and critic. He is currently on a short sabbatical from the University of Waterloo, where he is a drama professor.

The Complete Works of William Shakespeare (abridged) is playing at the Young People's Theatre until March 18. For more information or for tickets, call the YPT box office at 416-862-2222.

JEWISH KITCHEN DISPLAY EVOKES AROMAS AND MEMORIES

My Bubbe's Kitchen, an exhibition opening this week at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, celebrates that remarkable Jewish woman, the bubbie, and her various kitchen-based activities such as cooking, baking, sewing, laundering, and, yes, entertaining friends and family.

The exhibition consists mainly of artifacts loaned by members of the congregation and friends. Items include a kashering board, necessary to keep a kosher home; the hackmessers and large wooden bowls for chopping; wooden stretchers for hanging up socks; lace collars, rolling pins and other memorabilia.

The display is enhanced by stories told about the ingenuity and compassion of remembered bubbies, both in Canada and in Europe; the stories were obtained from interviews with residents of the Baycrest Terrace.

The exhibition opens Sunday Feb. 25 with a talk by cooking-school maven Temi Rosenthal. 4 to 6 p.m. Admission is free and old-fashioned refreshments will be served. 470 Glencairn Ave. 416-789-3213.

Newly Translated Singer Stories: Nobel Prize-winning Yiddish author Isaac Bashevis Singer, who died in 1991, is prolific even in death. No less than four of his Yiddish novels, including Shadows On The Hudson, have been translated into English and published posthumously. Now there's a new book of short stories, More Stories From My Father's Court (Farrar, Straus & Giroux), which is apparently a followup to his brilliant collection, In My Father's Court.

In the opinion of Toronto novelist Cary Fagan, who reviewed the book recently in the Globe and Mail, the stories "feel somewhat rougher and less shapely than those in the first volume ... [but most] are still lively and provocative."

***

Pearson Prize Finalists: Congratulations to Toronto writer Erna Paris whose recent book Long Shadows: Truth, Lies and History (Knopf Canada) has been shortlisted for the Pearson Writers' Trust Non-Fiction Prize. Congratulations also to Irena F. Karafilly, author of The Stranger in the Plumed Hat (Penguin Canada), a finalist for the Biography Prize.

Movie shows Hollywood's changed attitudes to Jewish characters

By RONALD CHARLES EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "Don't say you're Jewish on the screen."

For many years, this quote from Leon Uris' QB VII characterized the Hollywood atmosphere. Jewish executives routinely avoided material that might provoke an anti-Semitic backlash among moviegoers.

Today, this situation has changed. Contemporary Hollywood movie directors like David Mamet are more comfortable with Jewish characters and subplots.

In State and Main, Mamet's satirical comedy about a Hollywood crew's efforts to film a period piece, the producer, played by David Paymer, is Jewish. The character fits the physical stereotype – homely middle-aged man with a large nose – and also some cultural ones. He is an anxious person who will do anything to save the project and his own stake in it.

Mamet and Paymer skillfully handle a delicate situation, presenting a Jewish jerk in a manner that will not turn him into an anti-Semite's object lesson. The character is depicted as a Hollywood type, not some dark vision of "the eternal Jew."

Judaism also figures in a prop-driven subplot. A box of matzot is found in scriptwriter Joseph Turner White's room. In the year of the prop – Wilson the volleyball in Cast Away and the menacing fridge in Requiem for A Dream – the box's presence shows Hollywood's willingness to use Jewish references.

The humour lies in one character's attitude towards that box. Female star Claire Wellesley (Sarah Jessica Parker) sees it and wants to sleep with the dumpy writer (Philip Seymour Hoffman) because she thinks that he is Jewish.

This is an "inside" joke. It is not unusual for Hollywood Gentile women to form relationships with Jewish men – preferably powerful ones. Writers rank low on the industry totem pole; it is said that only a dumb actress goes to bed with one. Perhaps this is wish-fulfillment on playwright Mamet's part.

Gentile attitudes towards Jews are also satirized. A local politician (Clark Gregg) feels superior towards Jews and showbiz types, but is willing to be corrupted by the Jewish producer.

Although this film is a lighthearted interpretation of the conflict between Hollywood and "Middle America," it also satirizes the Jewish role in contemporary U.S. cinema.

In search of the Jewish community in Norway

By CURT LEVIANT and ERIKA PFEIFER LEVIANT

OSLO — Whereas Jewish settlement in Italy predates Julius Caesar, and Jews were living in Britain and France more than 1,000 years ago, it was not until 1851 that Jews were permitted to settle in Norway.

The constitution forbade Jewish residence until a compassionate Norwegian playwright named Henrik Wergeland began his relentless fight to have this unjust law changed. Parliament ultimately sympathized with Wergeland's cause (albeit after his death) and in 1851, the law was changed. Today Norway has the youngest and smallest Jewish community in the world.

Just before World War II, there were about 1,500 Jews in Norway, most of them in Oslo. During the war, the Germans – with the help of Norwegian Nazis – rounded up about half of the Jews, who were then sent to Auschwitz; only a dozen returned. The other half – with the help of the Norwegian resistance – were smuggled into neutral Sweden.

After the war, about 500 displaced persons, Jews who had survived the German concentration and death camps, were admitted into Norway.

In Oslo, I was surprised to learn that there is no Jewish community in Bergen, Norway's second largest city and a major port. After a scenic train ride, we arrived in this beautiful, vibrant and historic city, which is surrounded by seven hills.

To use the wonderful rail system in Scandinavia, be sure to get the Eurail Flexipass before you leave, and you'll save lots of money and lots of time. (Call 888-382-RAIL for information.)

Near the Augustin, the hotel we stayed at, I saw a clothing shop named Goldfarb, a Jewish name that drew me in. The Christian owners explained that the firm was indeed founded by a Polish Jewish family in 1900, but it has been under the current owners' management for a generation. Still, they decided to keep the name. The couple then stated proudly that they had visited Israel five times, and told us about the local Norwegian-Israel Friendship Society, which we soon called.

"Shalom," said a woman. A non-Jew, she knew only that one Hebrew word. She said there were about 40 Israelis in Bergen but no formal community or synagogue, although the western part of Norway, particularly Bergen, is decidedly pro-Israel.

Bergen radiates freshness, with cool sea breezes and an ambience of light. Particularly engaging are the museums, the famous fish and produce market, and the wonderfully preserved old wooden houses and lanes dating back to the Middle Ages. About 20 minutes away is the home of composer Edvard Grieg, which overlooks a lake and has a superb concert hall. Make sure you get a Bergen Card, which admits you to all public transportation, the museums and other sites.

No trains go from Bergen to Trondheim, but a bus operated by Nor-Way Express Buses does make this fantastic journey, which is perhaps the single most scenic one-day trip we ever took. Every minute was a picture postcard: mountains and valleys, fjords and waterfalls, meadows and farmlands.

Trondheim is a relaxed city with wide streets. It once served as the nation's capital and its Jewish community is the most northerly in the world. Be sure to see its fine museums, especially the Music Museum, the world-famous 900-year-old cathedral and one of Europe's leading orchestras, the Trondheim Symphony. Trondheim is a small town where everything is within walking distance.

From the Quality Prinsen Hotel where we stayed, we were literally down the block from the synagogue (you'll easily note its blue exterior) at Arkitekt Christiegate 1B, which includes a compact and informative Jewish museum.

The synagogue survived the German occupation because it was used as a warehouse, but the 230 Jews of Trondheim were less fortunate. Half were sent to Auschwitz in 1942, and six were murdered in Trondheim itself; only three returned, including our informant, Julius Paltiel, who was 17 at the time. Now he is the leader of the Jewish community and chair of the museum.

Paltiel traces his ancestry in the city back more than 125 years. His grandfather had a textile and clothing shop there in 1891. He is particularly proud of the imaginative museum, located on the ground floor of the building.

Many schoolchildren visit and are touched by the exhibit that highlights the tragic fate of 13-year-old Cissy Klein, who was gassed at Auschwitz.

Today, 120 Jews live in Trondheim and the intermarriage rate is very high. They hold services every Friday at 5:30 p.m. and once a month on Sabbath morning. There is no formal Jewish education, but one volunteer teaches the dozen children how to daven. Eighteen people were at the services we attended.

Paltiel told us about some unusual actions used to express anti-German resistance in the city during the war. People would wear pointy red wool ski caps, put their watches on the inside of their wrists, and affix paper clips on their lapels – until the Germans, aware of this, forbade these displays.

He also added that there used to be Jews as far north as the Arctic Circle, in Bodo and Tomso, who would come to Trondheim for the major holidays.

In Oslo, the mystery of why there was no Jewish community or synagogue in Bergen was seemingly resolved. There were two major reasons: transportation and attitude.

The rail line from Oslo ran north to Trondheim. At the end of the 19th century, Jewish pedlars slowly made their way north to towns along the railway, congregating in Trondheim and even further north. The railroad west to Bergen, across difficult mountainous terrain, was not completed until the 1920s. Moreover, there was a strong Germanic anti-Jewish attitude there that discouraged many Jews from settling, even though individuals did live there.

The Israelis who now live in Bergen are mostly women who married Norwegian UN soldiers who had come from Lebanon to Tel Aviv on vacation. They have little interest in establishing a formal community or a synagogue.

Taking control of asthma requires multi-faceted approach

Education is a key effective therapy

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Proper technique in using therapies, monitoring of lung function, necessary changes made to work and home environments, and efficient education all ensure proper control of asthma as well as a normal lifestyle, a panel told an audience at the Leah Posluns Theatre last week.

The program, titled Taking Control of your Asthma, was part of Mount Sinai Hospital's Healthy Living Lecture Series. It was also sponsored by the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and UJA FEDERATION.

Speakers were Kenneth Chapman, director, Asthma Centre of the Toronto Western Hospital, and president of the Canadian Network for Asthma Care; Meyer Balter, director, Asthma Education Clinics, Mount Sinai Hospital; Ron Grossman, staff physician, Mount Sinai Hospital, professor of Medicine at the University of Toronto and a consultant at Baycrest Geriatric Hospital; and Allan Coates, professor of pediatrics and physiology at the U of T and director of respiratory medicine at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Moderator was CBC Newsworld's Lorne Saxberg.

Chapman defined asthma as an "inflamed, irritated or irritable airway," which becomes worse under certain conditions, such as smoking. There is no cure, but it can usually be controlled, he stressed.

Controlled symptoms mean that there should be only very occasional wheezing, with little waking up unable to breathe, and only the occasional need to resort to emergency therapy.

"Someone with asthma should be able to lead a perfectly normal life," Chapman said.

It is important to measure lung function periodically, to ensure that the medication dosage is correct. More important, he said, is to ensure that people take the medication properly. A recent Angus Reid poll said that over 3/4 of people do not, while a British survey said that not only did many use metred dose inhalers (the most popular medication) incorrectly, but many health care professionals can't teach the technique properly. Especially doctors, Chapman admitted.

Balter noted that compliance with instructions is key to proper asthma control. Patients might understand the danger of cigarette smoking, dust mites, or animals, but don't necessarily take the steps to avoid them.

Education is a key to effective asthma therapy, not necessary (or preferably) by doctors, since "80 percent of patients forget what the doctor said by the time they leave the waiting room." The best way of conveying information effectively is education centres staffed by knowledgeable professionals who are also good teachers, Balter said. These can be found at Toronto Western, Mount Sinai, Scarborough General, Scarborough Grace, Peel Memorial hospitals, and the Hospital for Sick Children.

Grossman said that the best therapy for asthma is for the drugs to be delivered directly to the lungs, via inhalers, rather than in pill form. "With inhalers, patients need a significantly lower dose, most of it gets to the proper site, and there are less side effects."

Inhaled corticosteroids, such as Beclofort, Flovent and Pulmicort, have been proven effective as a long-term therapy, with broncodilators as an emergency use. There are now inhalers being developed that deliver both long-term and emergency treatment.

Coates slammed parents who decide to stop treatment in their children once they are symptom free for a few months. "They get lulled into thinking that their child is better. Then something triggers an attack, and the child is in intensive care with a life-threatening attack."

In reply to a question from the audience, Grossman said that there were no studies to show that alternative therapies had any effect whatsoever on asthma. "The companies that make them have no reason to do clinical trials, since people are buying them anyway, and if the therapy is proved useless they would only lose business."

Balter pointed out that studies have shown that 30 percent of patients improve on placebos, and that some of the alternative therapies from Mexico are in fact naturally-occurring steroids.

The panel reiterated a finding, reported earlier in The CJN, that corticosteroids taken by children do not stunt their growth.

Hezbollah vows to continue fight 'to liberate the Temple Mount'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah has pledged to help the Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in their conflict against Israel and in their fight to liberate the Temple Mount and Jerusalem according to leaflets attached to huge balloons and launched from South Lebanon recently.

The balloons landed in the industrial area of Kiryat Shmonah Sunday afternoon, initially causing panic among residents of the border town who have enjoyed a period of relative calm since the withdrawal of the Israel Defence Forces from South Lebanon in May last year.

"We are concerned about the situation at Har Dov," said Kobi Katz, the head of the Metula town council. "Hezbollah intends to escalate the situation and we must act wisely and bring an end to this."

Katz said he expected Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon to take action to ensure that the northern border remained quiet.

Meanwhile, Syrian President Bashar Assad and Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri met Sunday in Damascus to discuss "recent developments in the region and issues concerning Syria and Lebanon," said a report yesterday from the official Syrian news agency, SANA.

Last weekend, the report said, Assad also met with the speaker of the Lebanese parliament, Nabih Beri, to discuss "the situation in the Arab world."

In related developments, the Syrian regime has embarked on a public relations campaign against intellectuals who have expressed calls in recent weeks for rapid reforms toward more openness, democratization, the lifting of emergency regulations and the strengthening of "civil society" in Syria.

In response to such calls, allegedly coming from the "voice of the people," the government-controlled daily, Al-Ba'ath, warned last week of a possible deterioration in the internal situation in Syria, mentioning military coups, political unrest, internal division and foreign intervention in Syrian affairs.

Damascus reported last weekend that 17 representatives of the ruling Ba'ath party would be dispatched to all the Syrian provinces and the country's four universities in order to explain government positions, Assad's foreign and internal policies and his view of the activities of the intellectuals.

Australia ready to participate in 2001 Maccabiah

By STEFAN BIALOGUSKI
Australian Jewish News

SYDNEY — An Australian team at the Maccabiah Games in July appears to be a distinct possibility following agreement on a multi-million-dollar compensation payout for injured athlete Sasha Elterman.

The Zionist Federation of Australia (ZFA) has given a "conditional green light" to Australia's participation, now that the largest and most complex of the claims arising from the 1997 Maccabiah bridge collapse has been all but settled.

Four Australians died as a result of the tragedy and about 70 were either injured or, as in Elterman's case, left with serious ill-effects.

Now 19 and a first-year bachelor of commerce student at the University of New South Wales, Elterman swallowed toxic water after falling into the Yarkon River when the bridge collapsed. She spent almost a year in hospital and underwent about 30 operations.

According to a Jewish Telegraphic Agency report from Jerusalem, the Elterman compensation was $4 million US.

The New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies, Maccabi Australia (MAI) and the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) have all welcomed the breakthrough on the Elterman case, which is expected to precipitate agreements in the other main compensation claims. MAI sources say gaining the organization's support for a return to the Maccabiah should be a formality.

The agreement on Elterman's compensation – believed to be among the largest in Israel's history – was enabled by outgoing Israeli Finance Minister Avraham Shochat, who wrote to ZFA president Ron Weiser, approving a capped contingency payment to indemnify Elterman against medical costs.

Weiser has spearheaded the Australian community's negotiations with Israel on the matter, with all the agreements reached to date being between Israel and the ZFA.

"I'm greatly relieved," he told the Australian Jewish News.

"I believe this is a major breakthrough, which is going to make the finalization of other matters simpler. The best thing about this is that it will enable us to bring closure to a terrible tragedy. And it's the State of Israel – which wasn't a party to the [Maccabiah tragedy] – that's stepped into the breach and enabled matters to be resolved."

Two-thirds of the smaller compensation claims have now been agreed on, and the resolution of the rest would depend on the readiness of the victims and their lawyers to finalize their cases and present the necessary information, he added.

The Australian community's other demands have been, or are in the process of being, met: the delivery of loans to victims; proper admission of responsibility by the Maccabi World Union; and improved safety and security standards at future Maccabiah Games.

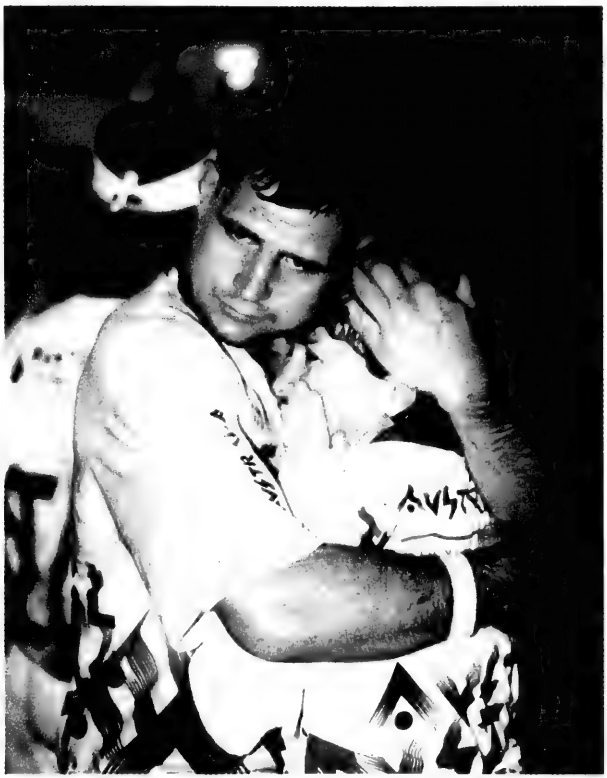
The ZFA "now deems it proper to give a conditional green light to our participation at the Maccabiah in July," Weiser said.

However, "there are still two issues: to assist the remainder of the claimants with their cases and to ensure that everyone receives payment of the agreed amounts. I've reassured the families this isn't the end of the matter for us. Our going to the Maccabiah wasn't the end of the story, just a step on the way. The ZFA reserves the right to reverse its recommendation to participate if it feels that the process involved in settling compensation fails to meet expectations."

Sasha's father, Colin Elterman, said his family was "extremely pleased that substantial progress has been made in resolving Sasha's claim.

"There are a few loose ends to resolve before we can say that we've settled, and we trust these will be finalized very soon," he continued. "We are comforted that the ZFA, ECAJ and Maccabi Australia will double their efforts and continue the struggle until all outstanding matters are properly resolved prior to Australian participation at the next Maccabiah."

Board of Deputies president Stephen Rothman said he was pleased that those who had suffered could now achieve closure and that a "possible aggravation of the relationship between the Australian community and Israel can be put behind us."



Australian team members console each other after the collapse of the bridge over the Yarkon River at the Maccabiah Games in 1997. [Isranet photo]

Still a shanda?

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Jewish organizations have long been at each others' throats, squabbling over territory, accusing each other of being an interloper, and jockeying over who gets to say what to whom. But that internecine churlishness has rarely spilled over into the public domain. Airing our dirty linen in public was a no-no. Our carriage before the gentiles was always to be mature, united, dignified, and sometimes quiet.

Until now.

Of course, I'm not one to shy away from dissent. I believe the community is strong and secure enough to engage in public debate on controversial – but serious – issues without fear of being a shanda far die goyim. Thirty years ago, Jewish newspaper articles about Jewish alcoholics and wife-beaters would have been considered heresy. I mean, my God, what will they think of us?!

Well, now they might think our our representative organizations are simply buffoons.

I refer to the recent article in B'nai Brith's house organ, the Jewish Tribune, whose allegations have been picked up by Toronto's NOW Magazine and the National Post. I was going to lay off on all this mud-slinging, but it's hard to ignore now that it's out in the open, so to speak.

To recap: the un-bylined front-page Tribune piece, headlined "Entire community embarrassed by CJC" (really?) and quoting unnamed "eyewitnesses," blasts Bernie Farber of Congress for bullying CBC Newsworld into dropping B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant from a list of experts the network was going to interview at the Lipa Green building the night people watched the results of the Israeli elections. Farber, the Tribune alleged, tried to "bar" Dimant and have him replaced by CJC president Moshe Ronen.

First, full disclosure: I was not a witness to the above. But I used to work for both the CBC and Congress, so I think I'm qualified to say that while both can be maddeningly pigheaded, there isn't a CBC producer alive who would be bullied by Bernie Farber; and while Farber can be persuasive, it's not in his character to bully anyone.

As a former director of communications for CJC's Ontario region, I know that the rule – nay, the law – is that when a journalist covers a Congress function, especially in the CJC's own building, it is the top lay person who gets the koved of being interviewed. If I know Farber, and I think I do, having worked with him, he likely insisted that Ronen be interviewed in addition to whomever else the CBC lined up in advance (in this case, it was Dimant). There's just no way he would have or could have strong-armed a producer into dropping Dimant altogether, as the Tribune alleges.

CBC types, as I know too, can be rough around the edges. Thus, the version of this tale I heard, and which makes more sense, is that after Farber insisted Ronen appear on camera, a CBC producer (not the one on site but one back at the Broadcast Centre) made some offensive remarks to Farber on a cell-phone, following which Farber told the crew, which heard only half the exchange, to leave, if that was going to be the CBC's attitude.

The CBC, on the air live with feeds coming in from Jerusalem and Washington, in a control room (talk about a misnomer) that is chaotic at best, decided, rightly or wrongly, to fix the problem by dropping Dimant. As one CBC executive told me last week, the whole thing was "an unfortunate misunderstanding" made in the heat of the moment.

The same executive, who is Jewish but not all that involved in the community, had this to say too: "I thought we're all on the same team."

Well? Are we?

WE SELL Amana FOR LESS

3/4 cup oil
2/3 cup white sugar
1/2 cup brown sugar
1 tblsp Passover vanilla sugar
1/4 cup cocoa
3 eggs
2 tblsp brewed coffee
pinch salt
1 1/4 cups matzoh cake meal
1/4 cup matzoh meal
2 tblsp potato starch
1/4 cup walnuts, finely ground
3/4 cup semi-sweet chocolate, coarsely chopped

Preheat oven to 350°F. Generously grease 8"x4½" loaf pan. In large bowl, whisk together oil, white, brown and vanilla sugars & cocoa. Whisk in eggs, coffee, salt, matzoh meal, cake meal & potato starch. Let stand 10 mins. Fold in chocolate & nuts. Spoon batter into prepared loaf pan.

Bake until top is set, 35-40 mins. Wrap loaf well in foil and refrigerate for a couple of hours to firm up. Reduce oven temperature to 325°F. Cut loaf into slices, about 1/4" thick. Place on baking sheet and bake, turning once mid-way, 15-20 mins.

Seniors & Health

• Dr. Shelley Veinish •

Dear Dr. Veinish,

My mother seems to be taking a lot of medications. How can I be sure she needs them all and is taking them properly?

Concerned

Dear Concerned,

Modern medicine offers us more options than ever before to treat the many ailments associated with aging. The goal of medication therapy should be to maximize benefits and minimize risks.

You can help your mother and her physician(s) to achieve this goal by applying a few basic principles.

First, you should determine if your mother understands how and why she is taking her various medications. If she sees numerous physicians, make sure they all know about all the drugs she receives. Help her to prepare an up-to-date list of her pills, the doses and the prescribing physician. You should also include drugs that were taken in the past and why they were stopped.

Suggest that she bring her medications in the pharmacy bottles to the doctor's office for regular review, including over-the-counter drugs, such as painkillers, antihistamines, laxatives, vitamins and herbal preparations. All of these can interfere with the desired effects of prescription medications.

Select one community pharmacist so that drug records and potential interactions can be identified. Determine how long a drug is to be continued and how to obtain prescription renewals. If a new drug causes side effects, let the doctor know immediately. It can be dangerous to stop a medication without informing the physician who prescribed it.

It is often necessary for an elderly person to take many different medications. To help with a complicated drug regimen, many pharmacists will dispense the medications in "blister packs" or dosettes, with the pills arranged according to time, for easy administration. Alternatively, you can purchase a weekly dosette and you and your mother can fill it together to decrease the risk of errors.

You can help your mother without undermining her dignity by encouraging her to participate actively in her own medical care. If she has memory problems, however, you may wish to obtain her permission to speak to her doctor yourself.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

The paradox of Israeli life

This scene at the Kotel last week poignantly captures the paradox of Israeli life now. These school children are on a field trip. There is no disruption in their ordinary routine. However, their teacher stands guard, weapon at the ready. This is part of the adjustment Israelis have had to make since the outbreak of the recent intifadah in September. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Powell meets Sharon

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — If U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell made anything clear during his visit this week to Israel and the Palestinian-controlled city of Ramallah, it was that things have changed since President Bill Clinton left office.

First, there was the duration of his visit – one day – with Powell's meetings with Israeli and Palestinian leaders wedged in between stop-offs in Egypt and Jordan.

Analysis

Visit portends change in U.S. Mideast policy

Second, there was the absence of any U.S. proposals – a hallmark of the Clinton era – aimed at ending the more than five months of Israeli-Palestinian violence and forging a final peace accord.

While Powell called on both sides to end the violence and return to negotiations – and pointedly told Israel to lift the economic sanctions it has imposed on the Palestinian Authority – he had little else to suggest to the two sides in his public comments other than that it is up to them to make the "hard decisions" that will enable them to return to the road of peace.

Since President George W. Bush took office in late January, U.S. officials have said that while they will continue to pursue Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking, it is but one facet of their overall Middle East policy.

CANADA

Landy Runs

TORONTO — Keith Landy, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, last week announced he will seek the presidency of CJC at the organization's national plenary this May, in a bid to replace current president Moshe Ronen. The deadline for filing candidacy papers for Congress elected positions is March 6.

Best UJA Ever

CALGARY — The 2000 United Jewish Appeal campaign raised $1.6 million, an 18 percent increase over the year before. Community leaders hailed the results as the most successful regular campaign ever in the city's Jewish community.

ISRAEL

Bulletproof Windows

JERUSALEM — Bulletproof windows are being installed in homes in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo, which has come under repeated attacks from Palestinian gunmen in the nearby village of Beit Jalla. The project will cost some $10 million, according to Israel Radio.

Settler Released

JERUSALEM — A Jewish settler convicted of killing a bound Palestinian terrorist was released from jail last week after serving eight years in prison. The High Court of Justice upheld Yoram Skolnik's release in a 4-3 ruling.

WORLD

Clinton Blasted

NEW YORK — U.S. Jewish leaders criticized former president Bill Clinton for trying to shift the blame for pardoning fugitive financier Marc Rich onto Israelis and Diaspora Jewish leaders. Clinton "should not use the Jews as scapegoats," said Ronald Lauder, head of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. In a recent New York Times piece, Clinton cited eight reasons for pardoning Rich in the final hours of his presidency. The last read, "Finally, and importantly, many present and former high-ranking Israeli officials of both major political parties, and leaders of Jewish communities in America and Europe, urged the pardon of Mr. Rich."

Rabbi Blasts Jews' 'Silence' on Pardons

NEW YORK — The head of the Reform congregational movement has issued a scathing rebuke of U.S. Jews who have been silent on former president Bill Clinton's controversial last-minute pardons, saying the Jewish community's silence has been "bought" with large contributions to Jewish causes.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the 906-member Union of American Hebrew Congregations, said Clinton's pardons of fugitive financier Marc Rich and four chassidic New York Jews reflected badly on the Jewish community.

Clinton pardoned four members of the chassidic Skverer sect in New Square, N.Y., who had been convicted of embezzling federal money for a fictitious school. The men's lawyers defended their actions, saying the money was not used for personal gain and was funnelled into the community.

Jews "who break the law in God's name and turn Torah into an instrument of thievery are bringing Judaism into disrepute," Rabbi Yoffie wrote.

As for Rich, Rabbi Yoffie said Jewish leaders had been "bought" by the fugitive's large contributions to the Birthright Israel program, which provides free trips to Israel for North American students.

Newspaper Scam

ST. LOUIS — A St. Louis man has been sentenced to five years in jail for fraudulently obtaining $2.5 million by claiming to be the publisher of two Jewish newspapers. Scott Maurice Rose, 37, pleaded guilty to mail fraud and was ordered to pay $2.5 million in restitution to victims who unwittingly rubber-stamped payment for ads they never took out. From 1991 to 2000, Rose claimed to publish the non-existent World News and Jewish World Review.

Holocaust Day

HELSINKI — Finland announced that next year it would begin observing an annual Holocaust memorial day on Jan. 27. Several European nations, including Britain, Italy, Germany and Sweden, already hold an annual Holocaust memorial day on Jan. 27, the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

Aliyah Down

MOSCOW — Immigration to Israel from the former Soviet Union decreased during the first six weeks of 2001, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel. A total of 3,542 immigrants made aliyah during that time, a 30 percent drop from the same period last year. Experts say the decrease is due more to an improved economic situation in Russia than fear of Middle East violence.

Fire Survivor Dies

NEW YORK — Rose Freedman, the last survivor of the 1911 Triangle Shirtwaist Co. fire in New York that killed 146 people, many of them immigrant Jewish women, died in Beverly Hills, Calif. on Feb. 15 at the age of 107. The fire, in which many girls and women jumped to their deaths from eighth- and ninth-storey windows, focused attention on poor working conditions and spurred the U.S. labour movement.

Anti-Semitic incidents soar at year's end: Audit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The conflict in the Middle East spilled onto the Canadian scene with a dramatic upsurge in the number of anti-Semitic incidents – and their severity – in the latter part of 2000, according to a report on hate statistics released last week.

Numbers up in Quebec
please see page 34

The jump in recorded incidents in October pushed the yearly total of anti-Semitic events to 280, a five percent increase over 1999, stated the 2000 Audit of anti-Semitic incidents, a report compiled by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC).

"Many of the incidents were much more violent than in previous years," said BBC president Lawrence Hart. In particular, Montreal was the scene for frightening occurrences, including a subway attack on a Jewish man that was broken up by bystanders when it appeared the man's assailants planned to throw him onto the railway tracks.

Hart pointed out the statistics recorded early in the year indicated a downward trend, but that was reversed by a "dramatic increase" in the latter half of the year. The number of events spiked in October, coinciding with the Palestinian uprising. Synagogues were firebombed in Edmonton, bomb threats were called into synagogues and other Jewish institutions and community leaders received death threats, he said.

The incidents "remind us how close to the surface" anti-Semitism remains, Hart said.

The League for Human Rights has been monitoring anti-Semitic incidents since 1982. It divides incidents into two broad categories: harassment, which includes incidents against people, and vandalism, which refers to incidents that target property.

Of the 267 reported incidents in 2000, 192 involved harassment, a decrease of six percent from the year before, and 88 involved vandalism, a 42 percent increase over the year before.

The League's audit found the number of anti-Semitic incidents peaked in 1995, with 331 reported, while last year's 280 was the third greatest since 1982.

Toronto, with 41.85 percent of the country's Jewish population, reported 39.3 percent of the incidents, followed by Montreal, with 24.1 percent of the population, reporting 25.3 percent of the events. Seventy-one incidents were reported in Montreal in 2000, almost double the 37 incidents of the year before.

Hart suggested the surge in hate statistics in Montreal reflects the events in the Middle East, as well as the tensions stirred by Parti Québécois member Yves Michaud, who suggested Jews feel they're the only people to have suffered through history and singled out ethnic voting patterns in Cote St. Luc, a predominantly Jewish suburb, during the 1995 referendum.

Rochelle Wilner, senior vice-president of BBC, said she personally felt threatened at an anti-Israel protest in downtown Toronto, that included calls in Arabic of "Kill the Jews."

"I was appalled to feel hate on the streets of Toronto," she said. "When police tell you they are not able to ensure your safety on the streets of Toronto, there is cause for concern."

Some of the report's findings include:

• A visibly Jewish man wearing a skullcap was accosted as he left his synagogue in Ottawa by five youths, who yelled "I hate f—ing Jews" at him.

• A high school in Fabreville, Que. was vandalized with graffiti that included racist slogans like "White Power," "Kill Jews" and "All Niggers must die."

• A bomb threat was called into the parliament buildings in Ottawa during a gathering to honour Holocaust survivors.

• In October, two synagogues in Edmonton were firebombed.

• On Yom Kippur, two synagogues in the north end of Toronto had eggs thrown at their

The logic of hatred

From the editor's desk

There is more than the usual unsettling sense of déjà vu and déjà entendu to the images and soundbytes we are seeing and hearing in the news emanating from the Middle East these days.

In particular, Saddam Hussein's portentous bellicosity returned last week to the front pages of the newspapers and to the lead items of the broadcast news. And it was not pleasant.

The week began with the fallout of the British-U.S. air strike at Iraqi radar installations. The strike was in retaliation for Iraq's increasing physical harassment of the allied airplanes protecting the no-fly zone that was imposed on the Saddam regime after the Gulf War 10 years ago.

The increased Iraqi harassment of the allied planes, of course, was no mere coincidence. Saddam was sending a message to the new American administration.

He revelled in the irony – as did editorialists, commentators, political cartoonists and pundits – that 10 years after his defeat/victory in the Gulf War, he now stood opposite "son-of-Bush."

The subplot of the harassment of the allied planes, therefore, was Saddam's desire to test the resolve of son-of-Bush.

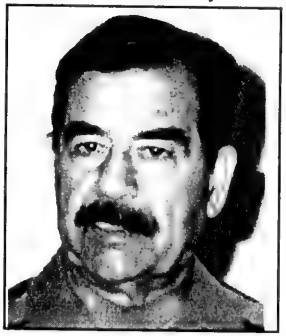
A second subplot, however, was without irony; it was simply full of menace, namely, the whisper of the renewal of the threat to the people of Israel, the spectre of Iraq-launched Scud missiles returned.

Israel had nothing whatsoever to do with the preceding week's U.S.-British raid against the Iraqi radar installations. Yet, in a stomach-turning repeat of history, the sword, once again, was pointed at Israel.

As he did 10 years ago and as he has tried to do since his ascension to power more than two decades ago, Saddam is determined to embroil Israel and the Jews in his confrontation with the West. Israel is the stick stirring his constantly seething cauldron of anti-Western agitation.

Of course, for him, as for many of the rulers and the oppressors in the Arab world, Israel is the embodiment of the West and therefore unwelcome in the part of the world they claim exclusively as their own. Indeed, according to their view of the world, not only is Israel an alien Western "intrusion" but, worse still, a Jewish one. Saddam's unceasing demonization of the Jewish state follows upon this logic of hatred.

To relieve his people of their suffering, he offers them a chimera rather than the truth, a scapegoat rather than a blueprint, revision rather than renewal. Outsiders, not he, are the cause of their misery.



Six million Iraqi "volunteers," Saddam recently boasted, (note the mischief of the number) are ready to "march to Palestine" for "jihad against Israel" to "liberate Jerusalem" from the "accursed Jews."

Presumably, these volunteers will begin their march after the flight of the Scuds.

Remarkably and regrettably, there has been very little, if any, outrage directed at Saddam by those same editorialists, commentators, and pundits who delight in the George W. irony, for the not insignificant threat Saddam aims at Israel.

No one doubts that Saddam continues at a frenzied pace to develop weapons of mass destruction: nuclear, biological and chemical. The cost of these efforts is enormous. It requires great sums of money, money he diverts from applying to the daily, ordinary, let alone humanitarian needs of his own people.

Even while so many observers in the West, moved sincerely at the suffering of the Iraqi people, decry the bite of the ongoing UN-imposed sanctions against Iraq, Saddam spends outrageous sums on his palaces and on the weapons program that he maintains unabated under cover of those palaces.

In a 12-page article that appeared on the eve of the 10-year Gulf War anniversary, in the Dec. 11, 2000 issue of The New Yorker, Jon Lee Anderson provides a comprehensive look at Saddam Hussein and the conditions of life he imposes on his people.

"There's no question that the Iraqis could pay for the needed medicines, medical equipment and foodstuffs, but they leave the situation as it is because it serves the regime's interests to bash away at the sanctions," Anderson reports a UN official as saying.

Pursuit of truth, free expression and the right of dissent are anathema to Saddam as they are to all tyrannies of one-man, one-party rule. But they are the very life-strength of democracy.

Thus, Western governments, including Canada, must not be taken in by the lies and the prevarications that Saddam foists on the world. More importantly, Western governments, including Canada, must make plain to him that they will vigorously oppose his attempts to harm Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East.

YMCA report backs Palestinian position

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A report by the World Alliance of YMCAs that backed the Palestinian position in the current round of Mideast violence is being criticized for being one-sided, discriminatory and bordering on the anti-Semitic.

"It's a rubber stamp of a Palestinian Authority document. It's totally over the top," said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre. "The World Alliance in Geneva has inserted itself in a wholly biased and political way into the Middle East. It's a report that cannot be allowed to stand."

The report that has stirred Rabbi Cooper's ire is based on the findings of a five-person delegation that visited "Palestine" for four days in mid-November. The delegation's report, which can be found at the World Alliance's Web site (www.ymca.int), was based solely on interviews with Palestinians and on visits to Palestinian areas. It lays the blame for violence on Israel.

"The one-sided nature of the conflict demands that the YMCA take the side of the oppressed Palestinian people," the document states. "There is use of a massive force against unarmed protesters and completely innocent people, mainly women, the elderly and children."

The report recommends the World Alliance urgently establish an "office for an observer" for up to six months to "monitor human-rights violations against the Palestinians." It also calls on the World Alliance to "urge local, national and regional YMCAs to network with relevant lobby groups and networks."

Rabbi Cooper said the report had "crossed the line in an objectionable and detrimental way. It is anti-Semitic in that it does not treat Israeli casualties in the same way as it does Palestinian victims."

Rabbi Cooper said he had raised concerns about the report to the World Alliance, as well as to national YMCAs in Canada and the United States.

Although the world body is a separate legal entity, it receives support from the national bodies around the world.

In a letter to Rabbi Cooper, Martin Vogler, president of the World Alliance, acknowledged the report's authors did not visit Israel "for reasons of time and circumstance."

The report was based on discussion with "many people who have been victims of Israeli aggression" and it reflects similar findings by other international NGOs and peace movements in Israel, he stated.

"The international community broadly takes the view that the Palestinians are the real victims of the ongoing tensions and lack basic and legitimate rights to a homeland and to live in dignity as all other people and nations," his letter states.

Meanwhile, the YMCA of the USA and YMCA Canada have dissociated themselves from the report. The American body has also threatened to withhold financial and organizational support for the World Alliance.

"The language, tone and characterizations included in these materials do nothing to aid the true cause of peace and stability nor do they position the YMCA for effective service across the boundaries of dispute," said Kenneth Gladish, the organization's national executive director, in a letter to the World Alliance.

"Despite our long and historic community of interest with the World Alliance, we cannot accept the egregious politicization which you have allowed in this matter," Gladish stated in a second letter to the World Alliance.

YMCA Canada chair Ray Mantha wrote to Leo Adler, Canadian representative of the Wiesenthal Centre, "concur[ring] with your observation that some of the statements are one-sided and biased... We will be addressing our concerns to the World Alliance with the hope that a more balanced and moderated perspective can be presented to our collective constituency."

YMCA Canada received "a small number of complaints" about the report, said Silvana Anania, the organization's director of international relations and programs. "We're trying to dialogue with the World Alliance about the report and ask that they express that it does not reflect the views of YMCA national movements," she said.

Anania said YMCA Canada is not considering withholding financial support from the world body, since those funds support local Ys in impoverished countries, which do important humanitarian work.

Lieberman shares experiences as UJA campaign ends

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As an immigrant and the daughter of survivors, the last thing you do is stand before a group of strangers and call attention to your differences, said Hadassah Lieberman.

Yet that is exactly what she did after her husband, Conn. Senator Joseph Lieberman, was named Al Gore's running mate in last year's American presidential election – the first Jewish American on a national ticket.

Speaking last week at the Toronto Centre for the Arts to an audience of about 900 people at UJA FEDERATION's festive campaign closing, Lieberman shared her experiences in a talk punctuated with warmth and humour.

The electoral campaign was gruelling, she said candidly, noting the sleep deprivation, the cramming of facts and figures into her head, and being "interrogated" on national television.

Her initial reaction – "This is nuts!" – gave way to the recognition of "a great opportunity and incredible experience."

It was Gore who urged the Prague-born, New England-raised Lieberman to share with the public what she said to him at a private dinner just after the nomination.

"I felt compelled to raise my glass and offer a toast," she recalled. "Thank you for choosing Joe," she said at the time. "I never would have dreamt I would be sitting here, the daughter of Holocaust survivors, an immigrant, and now the wife of the vice-presidential nominee. I thank you for this honour."

Those sentiments, she said, struck a chord with Americans from diverse backgrounds.

The Liebermans, who have been open about their observant Jewish lifestyle, were met with "nothing other than open arms and good wishes," she said.

With an adolescent daughter, two married children and two grandchildren between them, Lieberman and her husband of 18 years have been committed to "creating a life nurtured by our family and faith."

Following the nomination last August, they had to deal with a sizable Secret Service contingent and unaccustomed media attention, including one photographer perched outside their kitchen window the very first morning.

Hadassah Lieberman

Their saving grace was Shabbat, Lieberman said.

Although people went out of their way to accommodate their religious needs, the downtime necessitated by Sabbath observance was "unheard of" in the context of a national election campaign.

The weekly respite resulted in some interesting circumstances, like their first Shabbat on the campaign trail, in Lacrosse, Wis., when the rabbi of the local synagogue admitted that even on Yom Kippur, services never drew such a crowd. Some people travelled 95 miles for the Shabbat service, Lieberman said, and locals left wedding receptions to shake hands with the candidate and his wife as they walked by with their Secret Service entourage.

Lieberman said she hopes that the denouement of the campaign – the 35 days between the election and the determining of its results – made people understand that every vote counts. Earlier, at a media conference, she noted that, although that period was tough, her husband is a realist and they are not the type to react with bitterness.

She also mentioned her work in the field of health care and her related meetings, during a trip last year to Israel, with Israeli Arab women. She told reporters that, at the risk of sounding Pollyannish, "you have to believe in peace, and you have to believe in people."

Lieberman offered her congratulations on the Toronto federation's own campaign, which has raised $41 million towards its goal of $45 million.

The Campaign for our Children, as it was called, still has "some important gifts to finalize" but is well on target, said Ed Sonshine, who co-chaired the campaign with Ron Frisch.

Funds raised kept many Jewish families from being uprooted because they couldn't pay the rent, said Alan Sandler, federation president. Campaign funds also go to Israel and overseas Jewish communities.

Locally, 7,000 Jewish children live under the poverty line and hundreds have been victims of domestic violence, noted Frisch.

The ceremonies also included volunteer awards; a presentation of Hebrew music by Maytal Golan, Eyal Bar-David and Eyal Anteby; and the announcement of Campaign 2002 chairs Michael Bregman and David Koschitzky, as well as Lesley Binstock Offman as incoming Women's Campaign and Advocacy chair.

Christian silence

Last week, the Mufti of Jerusalem, Sheikh Edrima Sa'id Sabri issued a fatwa (a binding religious ruling), declaring that the Kotel, the Western Wall, was included in the area that was the property of the Wakf, the Muslim Trust that administers the Temple Mount. The Kotel, Sabri said, was one of the supporting walls of the Al Aksa Mosque, thus inviolate to Islam and beyond the control or reach of the Jews.

This latest fatwa followed an earlier one made by Sabri a few weeks before, proclaiming the entire Temple Mount area to be the exclusive property of the Wakf and thus the exclusive territory of the Muslim people. The import of both rulings, of course, was to openly dispute and reject any Jewish claim to the history of the Temple Mount or to the stones of the Western Wall.

Sabri was appointed by Yasser Arafat. One assumes, therefore, that Sabri's very demonstrative, public, religious declaration was made with the approval of the Palestinian Authority president to create yet another instrument of war to be used one day against the Jewish state. But Judaism will not be invalidated.

Justifiably, Israel's religious leaders expressed their outrage at Sabri's invidious intolerance. But inexplicably and sadly, there has not yet been one word of protest expressed by organized Christianity.

Western hectoring

Even as Western churches appeared to have lost their voices on the issue of Jerusalem, many of their political leaders, however, did indeed find sufficiently forceful language to hector Israel about the imminent financial collapse of Yasser Arafat's PA. Pointing an accusing finger at Israel for refusing to set aside its blockade of the territories or to forward to the PA the taxes withheld from Palestinian workers, western officials warn of the dire consequences.

"The fiscal crisis could lead to an institutional collapse, which will lead to further violence," Terje Larsen, the UN special envoy, said.

"Further violence!" Every day, Palestinians shoot at or commit other acts of violence against Israelis. Should Israel simply acquiesce to this? Should it reward the planners and perpetrators? Shouldn't there be consequences?

The blame for the near economic ruin of the PA should fall where it truly belongs: with Yasser Arafat. He and his regime are responsible for the violence. He and his regime should bring it to an end. Arafat's regime's corruption is so widely reputed in the region that the European nations and even the Arab League are reluctant to disburse the multi-million dollar funding they have sanctimoniously pledged. It is, alas, true that economic distress is a fertile breeding ground for Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad. But what a breathtaking hypocrisy to lay blame for the distress at the feet of the government of Israel!

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, 2000 in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Rabbi Melchior's special plea

In these turbulent times for the Jewish people, one issue continues to transcend all divides and unite us all – left and right, religious and secular, Ashkenazi and Sephardi – our profound concern for the well-being of all our young men and women in uniform and particularly, our prayers for the safe return of the IDF's missing and captive soldiers.

This painful chapter has accompanied our struggle for peace and security since the very inception of the State of Israel. And, even today, the government of Israel and its friends continue to invest every possible effort in order to win the release of all our sons – Zachary Baumel, Tzvi Feldman, Yehuda Katz, Ron Arad, Adi Avitan, Benny Avraham, Omar Souad and Elchanan Tannenbaum.

The human tragedy of our MiAs and PoWs pains the entire Jewish world. We are, after all, the extended family of these eight men – "All Jews are responsible for each other" – and so, we must not remain silent. Our actions will have a direct impact on the fate of our prisoners.

Jewish communities around the globe must also divert public attention to the agonizing plight of these men, who, in flagrant contravention of the Geneva Accords, have not been allowed any contact with the outside world, including the International Red Cross. It is paramount that the reprehensible conditions of their prolonged captivity be universally condemned - and that their freedom be won.

It is imperative that all Jewish communities exert maximum pressure on their local governments and enlist their active involvement in demanding an end to the captivity of our soldiers. This humanitarian cause must become a top priority for all democratic societies committed to fundamental morality, liberty and justice.

The deaf ears which have ignored our appeals must be forced to hear and to act now. This blemish on the collective record of the international community must be erased, and our captives must be returned safely to their families.

I urge you to join in the mitzvah of bringing freedom for these prisoners and to participate in this campaign of unparalleled urgency.

Sharansky the unifier

One couldn't help but feel a tremendous sense of pride for our community when 2,000 Toronto Jews gathered for the rally at the Shaarei Shomayim synagogue on Jan. 30.

Natan Sharansky, the power behind the sponsoring organization, One Jerusalem, magnetized the audience when he told the assembly: "The battle for Jerusalem is the battle for your life."

I couldn't help but recall the week of July 10, 1978, when a handful of activists took part in a round-the-clock vigil outside Montreal's Soviet Consulate, for the duration of Sharansky's trial. Mattresses and sleeping bags were hauled out at midnight, as the vigil continued through the night.

After five days, news of the verdict was communicated to us on the street. We wept openly, struck by the courage of the man whose final words delivered to his jury were: "Leshanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim."

From a courtroom in Moscow, Natan Sharansky had united the Jewish people. Jews of all religious beliefs stood together to cry out for freedom for Soviet Jews, and they continued to do so until Sharansky and hundreds of thousands of others were set free.

The Jerusalem for which Sharansky yearned as a prisoner in the dock is the same one for which he is fighting today, urging the Jewish people to remain united for the city that is the heart of the Jewish people.

Once more, Sharansky is the catalyst for unity. It was heartwarming to join a rally in an Orthodox synagogue and be addressed by three rabbis, one each from the Reform, Conservative and Orthodox movements.

It seems possible that Natan Sharansky may be the one to help mend the divisiveness among Jews, helping them to recognize that, regardless of our personal beliefs, we all God's people.

Thanks to anonymous teen

I want to thank the kind teenage boy who helped guide our lost six-year-old son home on Jan. 22, between the hours of 3:50 and 4:55 p.m.

My son stopped this person on Conley Road in Thornhill and asked him if he knew where Tansley Road was. They started walking together along Steeles Avenue to Bathurst Street, and when the teenager saw that Luke was tired, he offered to carry him home (about 3 kilometres). He delivered Luke safely to our front door. My husband thanked the teenager, but he didn't get any other information because he was so preoccupied with our son. It was a very emotional time for all of us. We are so, so grateful for his kindness. It's obvious this person went out of his way to ensure Luke's safety and comfort and we all want to say thanks for caring. We feel very fortunate that our son made contact with him. If we never make contact with this teenage boy, we rest assured that God knows about this good shepherd.

Turning the other ear

By ESTHER HECHT
Special to The CJN

Sue Kerman was furious.

The Palestinians in the territories started rioting last September, just as the Israeli government was saying a peace agreement was near. Kerman, a Jerusalem high school teacher, was even angrier when Israeli Arabs rioted in October. She was so incensed she almost cancelled her registration for a course titled The Palestinians in the Twentieth Century: An Inside View. But even more than she was angered by the violence, she was baffled.

Like many Israelis, Kerman, 53, was jolted into realizing she had no idea what motivated the Palestinians. "I needed more background," she said.

So when the course – co-sponsored by the Hebrew University's Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace and the Institute for Israeli-Arab Studies at the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute and funded by the Ford Foundation – began in November, Kerman was one of nearly 100 Jerusalemites who responded to the events by coming to hear "the other side."

For a change, they were to hear about it not through the filter of Israeli analysts but directly from Palestinian academics. So determined were the Israelis to learn that most of them signed up for the second semester of the course, which started this month. But they were in for a bumpy ride.

"It's not always easy for Israelis to hear everything that is said," they were warned at the outset by Prof. Amnon Cohen, head of the Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace.

Course organizer Adel Manna, head of the Institute for Israeli-Arab Studies, began by presenting the Israeli narrative of Zionist endeavour in the 20th century and then with its mirror image: the Palestinian narrative of the same events.

The audience was visibly uncomfortable as Manna described the Palestinians' gradual realization in the 1920s and 1930s that the Zionist enterprise, which led to establishment of the state of Israel, undermined their own national aspirations.

During coffee breaks, the participants expressed a range of reactions. Ari Rath, 75, former editor of the Jerusalem Post, said he had "expected to hear more extremism; it was very factual."

Kerman, however, commented that "how they whitewash themselves upsets me." And Ariel Ginsburg, 67, retired director of a chemicals firm, declared, "Nothing bothered me," but noted that the woman next to him looked "ready to pull out a machine gun."

Outside the lecture hall, each week brought more violence on both sides. Yet the lecturers came as promised, even when travel restrictions in the West Bank made it nearly impossible; and the students listened politely, even when they disputed the historical facts presented.

But in the fifth week of the course, when Nazmi al-Jubeh, a historian at Bir Zeit University in Ramallah and a member of the Palestinian negotiating team in 1991-93, described the Jewish population of Jerusalem's Old City as having "left" in 1947, one student interjected angrily, "They were expelled!"

Jubeh responded with obvious irritation, "Okay, expelled."

But then the student retorted, "Besides those who were killed," causing Manna to cut in and ask that the participants "Stop the provocations."

At other times, Manna reminded argumentative students, "We're not here to conduct negotiations."

Apart from Manna, whose straightforwardness and perfect Hebrew won the participants' admiration, the lecturer to whom the students warmed most was Yezid Sayigh, author of the definitive Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949-1993.

Sayigh, a Cambridge University professor of international relations, began by stating that identity was constantly being constructed, that the role of violence was not unique to the Palestinian case, and that the form Palestinian nationalism took was not inevitable.

According to Sayigh, violence became central to Palestinian aspirations for a state only after non-violent modes of political expression were blocked.

"Violence enabled a particular [nationalist] formulation to assert itself, to compete with other ideological possibilities," he said. His own family, for example, refugees from Tiberias, "believed Palestine was southern Syria and should be merged with Syria."

Rema Hammami, who spoke about the Palestinian women's movement, was asked whether Palestinian women had sought role models in the Israeli women's movement.

It's a question Israelis always ask, said Hamammi, chair of the graduate program of the Institute of Women's Studies at Bir Zeit University. Her answer was "No." Their models came from revolutionary movements in Vietnam, Cuba and the Third World.

The first semester dealt with the historical background of today's events. In the second semester, students had a choice: culture, language and the arts; the Arabs in Israel; or economics and democracy.

Planned excursions to Palestinian areas, cancelled in the first semester because of the continuing turbulence, were to be replaced by a lecture on the holy month of Ramadan, which coincided with the course, Manna said.

After the Ramadan lecture, a religiously observant student said she was surprised to learn how similar some of the customs were to those of Judaism. Several students suggested that a similar lecture series be set up for Palestinians.

In fact, the first such year-long course, in 1995, was for Palestinians. Lectures were given by Israeli professors and researchers who spoke in English, and Israeli Arab professors, like Azmi Bishara (today an MK), who spoke in Arabic.

That course – funded by a German foundation – was held in conjunction with the Society of Arab Studies, at Orient House in east Jerusalem, and had 50 participants.

Manna and Bishara produced a book in Arabic containing eight articles related to the lectures, and, according to Manna, it sold well – more than 2,000 copies. Amman University in Jordan reprinted and distributed individual articles.

In the second course, for Israelis, the lecturers were Palestinians, mostly from the West Bank. Sixty Israelis completed the year.

In the current round of courses, offered in both Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, enrolment in the two semesters in Jerusalem totals 130 and another 40 have signed up in Tel Aviv. Ford Foundation policy is that a parallel course for Palestinians be organized by the Palestinians themselves, Manna said, yet so far, current events have interfered.

Manna, who acted as moderator, added a personal touch by describing his own experiences. Born in 1947 in Majdal Kurum, a village in Galilee, his family was expelled in 1949 as part of a "thinning out" of the Arab population, but they managed to return after a legal battle.

He earned his doctorate in Middle Eastern history at the Hebrew University and has taught there and at universities in the West Bank.

Since 1995, he has headed the Israel Institute for Arab Studies, a non-profit centre specializing in research and publications on Israeli Arabs and educational projects for the Arab public.

Facing a roomful of Israelis can be daunting, Manna said in an interview at the start of the second semester, but "we get a lot of encouragement from the students, which keeps us going, because personally, it's not easy to give this course."

The Institute has started working with Russian-language journalists, to reach the country's one-million Russian-speakers. "The idea is to become an information centre to supply services to all kinds of groups," including students and journalists, Manna said.

He would like to see the idea spread to universities and teachers' colleges throughout the country, so that instead of listening to Israeli experts talk about the Palestinians, they would hear Palestinian academics. The Education Ministry recently expressed interest in providing such a course for teachers.

Manna is certain the current course is not simply "preaching to the converted." Though the majority are politically centre or left-wing, "they find out very quickly that they know very little and that they have many stereotypes."

That ignorance and failure to acknowledge the viewpoint of the other side is compounded by condescension, he said. "That is why so many Israelis, and especially left-wingers, were so surprised and baffled by recent events."

Information is crucial to peace, he believes, because "the Israeli leadership and Palestinian leadership are close to reaching an agreement that will end the conflict," but the public is not. Without acknowledgment of the other side's point of view, there will be no popular support for an agreement, he said.

And indeed, one student in the course, who asked to remain anonymous, summed up the new perspective the lectures had given her.

"I am certain of the justice of our cause," she said, "but now I'm also certain of the justice of theirs."

A strange star

The Weizmann Institute in Rechovot, Israel – named after the country's first president – never fails to amaze me. I subscribe to its news services and thus learn regularly of the astonishing advances engineered by the institute.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The latest has to do with what scientists often call, "a strange star." The name indicates a celestial entity whose existence was predicted some 15 years ago, but which has eluded direct observation since then.

Vladimir Usov of the institute's condensed metaphysics department outlines several characteristics of these types of stars, one of them being our inability to view them directly and our being restricted to surmising their existence.

The prediction of the star's existence stems from Prof. Edward Witten of the Institute of Advanced Study at Princeton University, who described its crucial component as a "quark," considered one of the six types of the tiniest building blocks of matter. They do not usually exist as separate entities and are briefly flitting across the observer's view in high energy particle accelerators.

Because the" strange star" consists almost entirely of quarks, it remains invisible, yet real, in that it does emit electric pulses that can be traced. Says Usov: "Only a handful of the heavenly bodies observed in our galaxy are probably strange stars, but they would constitute a totally new class of celestial objects with extraordinary properties."

I will not go into further details about a subject about which I have limited understanding, but nonetheless am convinced that the Weizman Institute is indeed an ideal place to deal with it.

For after all, the institute is located in Israel, and it was in that nation thousands of years ago that the search for the invisible and yet real was first instituted in the history of humanity. It may seem odd to connect astronomy and its physics with religion, but every human search has an open-ended quality – whether it is a search for the divine that cannot be seen, or for some "real" matter that partakes of the same phenomenon.

Some 65 years ago, I was on my first trip to the Promised Land, and the world-renowned philosopher, Martin Buber, was also on the ship. In the lecture he gave to us, he pointed to the heavens and said, "Nowhere else are the stars as close to earth as they are here." Of course, this was supposed to be a metaphor, but it has resonated in my memory ever since.

The latest information from the Weizmann Institute – limited as my understanding of it is – speaks in these tones. If strange stars are ever to be seen, it will be in Israel.

Students need to raise pro-Israel awareness

The Birthright Israel program that was created last year has brought many new faces into Jewish communities across North America. Birthright Israel's mission is to "present lifelong Jewish values to Jewish young adults worldwide through a first educational peer-group trip to Israel." These fortunate people get a trip to Israel for almost two weeks. They learn about their past, travel in an incredible land, establish their roots, make a connection to Israel and have the financial concerns looked after by a variety of philanthropists.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Needless to say, the results of the trips from last year were overwhelmingly successful and many more applicants have been chosen for upcoming trips.

The Atlantic communities, in particular, saw how the attendees of this trip gained a lot from the experience, as many Birthright participants became involved in The Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students' Federation (APJSF) programs. Further, the Atlantic contingency was inundated with applications in September 2000 for the upcoming trips this year.

But things have changed.

While there were not nearly enough spots for all of the applicants last year, it makes me very sad to see the Atlantic Jewish Council has had trouble finding participants for all of the spaces allotted for the region this year. The reason given by most of the people who withdrew their applications is simple: they are afraid to be traveling in Israel at a time when there is turmoil.

Although I recognize that the situation in Israel is not ideal and I appreciate the fear one would feel about going there, it is still distressing to observe the reduction in support for Israel from our area.

If people apply for Birthright and then withdraw because of the intifadah, one would hope that their initial interest in Israel would keep them involved in supporting Israel.

Let's see solidarity expressed in other ways. For example, there have been groups on campus that have attempted to spread mass propaganda against Israel. The APJSF has repeatedly advised the Jewish student body about the problem of anti-Israel speakers appearing in various campuses.

But more can be done. We have had lower than desired numbers in attendance at various functions and we need to engage as a group. There is a large enough Jewish student population in and around Halifax to do better.

The best way to broadcast on our campuses that anti-Israel rhetoric will not be tolerated, is to deal in numbers. The message to all students on campuses, not only in Halifax, but across Canada, must be: Take part in what your school has to offer.

In Halifax, we will be organizing a list of speakers who will be helping to raise awareness on campuses. It will be very important to have large turnouts in support of Israel to counter-balance a show of anti-Israel protesters at these assemblies.

To the students of Halifax and surrounding areas: Please come and show your support for Israel. While we might not all agree on exactly how peace should be attained in Israel, we all agree that the violence must stop.

The next time that you receive an e-mail from apjsf@hotmail.com, please take it seriously. Your involvement is valuable and if you feel that you can't go to Israel on a trip like Birthright, show your support locally. It will still make a difference.

Think back to what Queen Esther accomplished... Happy Purim!

Group fosters pride in Jewish community

A few months ago I wrote my first article for The Canadian Jewish News. I wrote about the Winnipeg Jewish community and some of the events or groups that contribute to the strong sense of pride our community often exhibits. One of these groups is the Chai Folk Ensemble, who performed their major annual show on Feb. 20.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Chai is one of the more remarkable things to come from Winnipeg and it is something that everyone can take pride in and feel a part of. The show, which is performed at the Winnipeg Concert Hall, draws hundreds of people from inside and outside the Jewish community.

This 37-year-old group is an important asset to the community for many reasons. First, they are known throughout the world, as they have performed in Mexico, in Israel and at Disneyworld. This year, they are the only North American group to have been invited to perform at the Kineret Festival in Venezuela. Their renown has put Winnipeg's Jewish community on the map. Many people from here take pride in the fact that our community is known in various countries, and if you ever find yourself talking to fellow Jews around the world, there is good chance they will have heard of Chai.

Another positive aspect is that the members are almost all of university age. Being a part of Chai is a major commitment for the participants, which means that at least once a week (and every day for the week leading up to the show), they are engaged in an activity with other Jewish young people. Chai allows many of the performers to feel a connection to the Jewish community that they might otherwise not seek out.

Chai has a large musical repertoire, which includes Naomi Shemer's Jerusalem of Gold and the traditional Hebrew piece, Ad Matai, two songs that provide just a snapshot of the type of musical numbers performed at Chai shows. Personally, I go to the show to see my friends perform and for the music. Other than bar mitzvahs and listening to Finjan, Winnipeg is limited in the Jewish music department. Chai brings to light an assortment of songs that most of the community would never hear.

I think it is very important to have something like this in our community. Many people leave Winnipeg's Jewish community to flourish in other cities, and oftentimes people (at least students around my age) feel suffocated in the community and in Winnipeg in general.

Although Chai is not the answer to these problems, it does ease some of the year's cabin fever and adds strength to the community. For example, the members are able to find something that will bring them success and acclaim, and they are able to use their talents and perform for hundreds of people. Although this will not keep people involved in Winnipeg or the community forever, it does mean that many of the group's members will stay in Winnipeg for their university careers in order to participate in Chai. This allows the community to retain some of the Jewish youth that might otherwise decide to live somewhere else.

Chai brings people out of the Jewish Community Centre. This is important because almost all the Jewish community's events take place at the JCC. At times, this can be somewhat overwhelming, especially if you are a high school student or frequently use the facilities. It is easy to find yourself feeling as if you actually live at the Asper Campus. The major Chai show (and its subsequent smaller shows) is a great opportunity to get together in a place that is not the campus. I know of some people who won't go to the JCC, but do attend the Chai shows and this is one of the few times that they feel a connection to the Jewish community.

Chai is an important part of the history and the makeup of our Jewish community. Rachel Tenenbein, who has been dancing with the group for four years, sums up the importance of this dance ensemble. "Chai is the amalgamation of art and culture. It showcases the community's finest talent and brings an international name to Winnipeg's Jewish community."

Ellen Seligman: Margaret Atwood's editor

Behind every published novelist or poet lurks an indispensable presence, an editor who reads and shapes a manuscript – a flight of the imagination – in a rigorous, time-honoured process.

"There is an intense and intricate dialogue between an editor and a writer," explained Ellen Seligman, one of Canada's ablest literary editors.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

During these exchanges, which can last as little as a couple of months or as long as a year, the makings of a book emerge.

Seligman, named Editor of the Year in 1998 by the Canadian Booksellers' Association, has been poring over manuscripts since the late 1960s. And now, as publisher of fiction at McClelland & Stewart – a venerable Canadian house – she decides what prose and poetry will be published.

Connoisseurs of fine Canadian literature are doubtless familiar with her list of authors. A fiftysomething woman who started with McClelland & Stewart in 1977 as a senior editor, she has worked with, and helped develop the careers of such luminaries as Margaret Atwood, Irving Layton, Michael Ondaatje, Anne Michaels and Rohinton Mistry, among others.

Born and raised in New York City but living in Toronto since 1976, Seligman is a jack-of-all-trades, dealing with agents, negotiating contracts, reading manuscripts, overseeing copy editors, supervising typeface and cover design, writing dustjackets and handling promotional publicity.

Above all, she strives to be "an ideal reader," an empathetic, discerning editor who understands and responds to a writer's intentions and sweeps away "obstructions and problems" in a manuscript with the stroke of a pen.

Ensconced in a spacious ninth floor office filled with the published works of some of Canada's most famous novelists and poets, Seligman publishes seven to 12 new novels annually and runs a popular reprint series – Emblem Editions – that turns out four to seven titles per year.

"We also have a poetry program," she added. "We publish four volumes of poetry during the spring season."

Until the mid-1980s, McClelland & Stewart was the sole Canadian publisher of its size to showcase poetry on a regular basis. Today, its poets include the likes of Leonard Cohen, Lorna Crozier, Stephanie Bolster and Dionne Brand.

Although McClelland & Stewart does not accept unsolicited submissions, there are no shortage of manuscripts submitted through regular channels. "At any given time," she said, "we have close to 50 under assessment."

As its foremost "ideal reader," Seligman has the first and last word about the suitability of a manuscript.

The selection process is subjective and subtle, if not complicated and mysterious. As she put it: "There is no formula or system for editing. It grows out of instinctive responses. I don't set out with any criteria. I read a manuscript and respond to it on its own terms. I apply professional judgment as to whether we can publish a book successfully."

Crossing her desk occasionally is a manuscript that is otherwise publishable, but just not right for McClelland & Stewart.

Acknowledging that literary tastes are strictly personal, Seligman allowed that there have been times when she has not been enthusiastic about a particular work that others have praised to the heavens.

As a result, she has missed a few "big ones." Dwelling momentarily on the literary gems that have eluded her grasp, she observed: "In retrospect, I can say that these things, of course, happen. It happens to everyone in the industry. But it doesn't happen that often. You sort of have to roll with it."

Basically, Seligman works with three kinds of writers: household names like Atwood (The Blind Assassin) or Ondaatje (The English Patient), developing ones like Andre Alexis (Childhood) or Shyam Selvadurai (Funny Boy), and brand new ones like Elizabeth Hay (A Student of Weather) or Elyse Gasco (Can You Wave Bye Bye, Baby?)

Known as a tough editor, Seligman takes pride in being a taskmaster. "I take it as a compliment. It means I have a stake in the books being the best they can be for McClelland and Stewart and [for] the author."

Before she takes on a writer, she determines whether they can work well together and are on the same creative wavelength.

"It's not as if an author signs a contract and is then subjected to a big surprise," she said.

Collaborating closely with writers, Seligman is always mindful and respectful of their talent. "Ultimately, it's an author's book." If modifications are required, she can be quite forceful. But this is not really a problem. "I've never met an author who was unwilling to consider suggestions for change."

When she examines a manuscript, Seligman concentrates on such make-or-break matters as structure, pacing and character development. When she is finished, two in-house copy editors scour it for style, punctuation, spelling and factual accuracy.

"Once a manuscript is in the final edit phase, it usually takes four to six months to turn it into a book."

In her estimation, a good editor is bound neither by pre-conceived notions nor by rules.

"Editors have to let books speak to them. They should respond to many different voices."

Seligman never knows what to expect when she begins reading a manuscript. "You can be dazzled by the first chapter, and then too many wrong turns follow." Alternatively, a novel may unfold at a more leisurely pace before it finally leaves a favourable impression.

One of her most important discoveries was Anne Michaels, whose novel of the Holocaust, Fugitive Pieces, was an international sensation. "I was pretty amazed by her first novel," said Seligman. "It was profound and exquisite."

Asked whether she has any advice for young, aspiring writers, she replied, "Keep on writing and developing your own voice. Read books. See what's out there and who's publishing what."

As a young woman, Seligman absorbed these lessons proficiently.

Her father, a prosperous businessman, enrolled her in a progressive private school with a strong focus on literature and history.

"I had wonderful, inspirational teachers. They helped me become an analytical reader. I always loved reading."

After earning a BA from the University of Wisconsin, she was hired by MacMillan, a New York publisher, as an administrative assistant to the editor-in-chief. She toiled at MacMillan for about five years, learning the business from the bottom down.

Subsequently, in London, England, she worked as a junior editor for W.H. Allen, a trade house that no longer exists.

Seligman cannot remember the first manuscript to which she was assigned, but recalls having laboured over a theatre memoir and a cookbook.

She left London after two years, heading to Toronto for "personal, romantic reasons." By then, having become something of an Anglophile, she had no desire to return to the United States, where her sister, Maggie, a teacher, still lives.

In her first year in Toronto, Seligman worked as a freelance editor. Among her clients was McClelland & Stewart. When an editor there took maternity leave, McClelland & Stewart offered her a full-time job.

She has not been tempted to go back to the United States. "I love Toronto. It's so culturally diverse. I miss New York City in certain ways, but my life is very full in Toronto."

Her "partner," James Polk, is a former literary publisher and editor, a published novelist and a pianist who has been involved at the provincial government level in culture and the arts. They have no children.

Working 12- to 14-hour days on average, she rarely reads just for leisure. "It's very difficult to read for pleasure. I always have manuscripts waiting, which is a problem for publishers."

An intensely private person whose pastimes include film, theatre, music and gardening, she has yet to write a novel. "I've never had the concentration to do so, and this is not unusual for editors. But I'm a great letter writer!"

Although some of her dearest friends are McClelland & Stewart authors, she makes a point of drawing a line between friendship and duty. So when she is editing a manuscript, Seligman is never less than professional in assessing its strengths and weaknesses, regardless of its authorship.

The Oxford Dictionary of Phrase and Fable*, edited by Elizabeth Knowles, Oxford University Press, $63.95

Of the making of reference books there is no end. I'm addicted to them. My library contains three sturdy shelves crammed with volumes of noble and memorable quotations, and books that provide quick and useful information about such diverse subjects as authors, literature, religion, history and geography, folklore and superstition, etc.

Books of Jewish reference abound. From my desk, I can make out such titles as Treasury of Jewish Quotations by Leo Rosten, The Word, A Spiritual Source Book by Noah ben Shea, Two Jews, Three Opinions by Sandee Brawasky and Deborah Mark, Words of the Wise by R. Alcalay and Day by Day – Reflections on the Themes of the Torah Found in Literature, Philosophy and Religious Thought by Chaim Stern.

The Oxford Dictionary of Phrase and Fable is a massive volume of 1,223 pages. It contains over 20,000 words, names and phrases with cultural resonance; items from history and religion, mythology, biography, folk customs, science, technology and philosophy.

Naturally, there are many references of Jewish interest. The following are a number of these, culled by browsing through the pages of this rich, diverse and fascinating tome:

Horns of Moses – in traditional art, Moses may be represented with horns, based on a misreading of the passage describing his descent from Mount Sinai, in which the Hebrew word for "rays of light" surrounding his head has been mistranslated.

Haredi – a member of any of various Orthodox Jewish sects characterized by strict adherence to the traditional form of Jewish law and rejection of modern secular culture, many of whom do not recognize the modern state of Israel as a spiritual authority. The name is from Hebrew, literally "one who trembles [in awe at the word of God]."

Gehenna – in Judaism and the New Testament, hell. The name comes via ecclesiastical Latin from Greek geenna, from Hebrew ge' hinnom "hell," literally "valley of Hinnom," a place near Jerusalem where children were sacrificed to Baal, as in Jeremiah 10:6, "This place shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of slaughter."

Sephardi – a Jew of Spanish or Portuguese descent. They retain their own distinctive dialect of Spanish (Ladino), customs and rituals, preserving Babylonian Jewish traditions rather than the Palestinian ones of the Ashkenazim. The name is modern Hebrew, from Sepharad, a country mentioned in Obadiah 20 ("the captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad") and taken to be Spain.

Naboth – in the Bible, the owner of a vineyard coveted by King Ahab; when Naboth refused to sell it, Ahab's wife Jezebel caused him be falsely accused of blasphemy and stoned to death. On taking possession of the vineyard, Ahab was warned by Elijah that the sin would bring disaster on his dynasty and on Jezebel. The story is referred to allusively for situations in which one who is already wealthy covets the single possession of another.

Jew's harp – a small lyre-shaped musical instrument held between the teeth and struck with a finger. It can produce only one note, but harmonics are sounded by the player altering the shape of the mouth cavity. The name of the instrument is an ancient one, but no connection with Jews has been established with certainty.

The Internet revolution

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Any observer of the world of Jewish genealogy over the past decade cannot help but note the revolution that the Internet has produced.

JewishGen, the chief Web site for Jewish genealogy, receives millions of hits each month. It is, by all accounts, a phenomenally useful tool that supplies invaluable educational and informational aid, puts dozens of searchable databases at researchers' fingertips, and unites a worldwide community of volunteers and researchers.

Dozens of special interest groups regularly exchange ideas, information and research tips. Digests from several such groups arrive daily at my computer, each loaded with so much information that it's hard to find time just to scan the lists of contents.

JewishGen's main discussion group digest often contains 50 messages or more. In addition, I receive daily digests from a Belarus research group and a Lodz research group. I also receive messages from various groups undertaking projects in Polish towns such as Warta and Piotrkow Tribunalski.

Watching a new research group being born is vaguely like observing the birth of a supernova in the heavens. Last month, someone had the brilliant idea of taking the JewishGen Family Finder and writing to everyone researching the common surname Rabinovitz.

There ensued a spontaneous explosion of messages, each brimming with details of particular families from particular towns. After two weeks, the chatter died down. I am not sure if there was sufficient critical mass for any genuine genealogical connections to have occurred.

Get connected to your heritage! Visit the JewishGen site at www.jewishgen.org/.

A Cautionary Tale: The man was not religious; in fact, he was an habitue of the beer hall rather than the synagogue. Although he hardly understood its significance, he had told his children that he was a descendant of the tribe of Levi, those who served the kohanim (priests).

When he died, his children told the rabbi at the funeral home about the Levitical connection, and the word "Ha-levi" was carved after his Hebrew name on the tombstone.

Decades later, a grandson, newly smitten by the genealogical bug and the meaning of his Jewish heritage, began searching through cemeteries for his grandparents' graves. Eventually he found the monuments, read the Hebrew inscriptions and marvelled at the previously unknown priestly connection.

Further investigation, however, produced some doubt. An aunt recounted by what flimsy hearsay evidence the story had been transmuted into the cold hard reality of stone.

Only after considerably more research involving letters to distant cousins across the sea, did the grandson learn the truth: his great-grandmother had come from a family of Levi'im, but since the distinction is passed down through male descendants only, it did not apply to his grandfather.

Although the rabbi urged the family to correct the tombstone, they have evidently chosen the more expedient method of allowing time and the elements to erase the mistake.

The moral? Don't believe everything you read – not even if it's carved in stone.

As experienced genealogists know, information degrades over distance and time. Glitches occur, even to the best of us. It's amazing the things we know that just ain't so; and the many suppositions that, through some mystical process, become elevated into facts.

Case in point: last month's assertion in this column that composers Berlin, Gershwin et al were of German descent, which an astute reader has corrected. The source was an article in a scholarly journal. Now I understand why the late writer Isaac Bashevis Singer had professed a sincere belief in gremlins.

Experienced genealogists know they have to collect at least three independent sources of a suspect piece of information before reliably attributing it as a fact.

Purim sites for kids

The month of Adar is already here, and that means Purim is just around the corner. There is no holiday more geared towards kids (and the kid in all of us.) So this week, a look at Purim sites for children.

Start your tour at the Virtual Jerusalem site [www.vjholidays.com/purim/]. This large section has everything for children: from a history of the holiday and its traditions to quizzes and games. My favourite page at Virtual Jerusalem also has a great title: The Abridged Abbreviated Annotated Scratch & Sniff Megilla, A Cuckoo Condensation [www.vjholidays.com/purim/cookoo.htm]. This is a wonderful holiday storybook complete with hilarious sound effects. Just follow the story, and every time you pass your computer's cursor over a picture of a gragger, it will make the appropriate sound effect. Hear the booing when Haman is promoted to the King's second in command; listen as the gallows are built to hang Mordechai; and cheer along when the Jews are saved.

The Cyber Purim Play is really two treats in one [www.shemayisrael.co.il/purim/purim_play/]. It's a 16-page holiday colouring book that you can print out. But it's accompanied by an audio play that tells the story of the holiday. Great for kids who can't yet read. (You will need the free Shockwave plug-in to hear the site.) Be prepared to stay awhile. This is a large site that takes some time to download.

Also check out Aish HaTorah's colouring pages featuring the ubiquitous Monty Mermeltashen [www.aish.com/holidays/purim/coloring_pages.asp].

Over at Torah Tots – Purim Fun and Games, there's a lot going on [www.torahtots.com/holidays/purim/purim.htm]. You can solve the secret message at Purim Letter Link, look for hidden words at Purim Word Find and find out about Purim Around the World. There are even two versions of the Purim megillah Story, one in English, one in Yiddish [www.torahtots.com/holidays/purim/purshpl.htm]. Or you can watch a slide show with the story of Purim [www.tzivoshashem.org/yomtov/purim/slideshow/slideshow.htm]. It's corny, but effective.

Need help with your costume? At Purim on the Net [www.holidays.net/purim/costumes.html], print out masks of King Achashverosh, Queen Esther and Haman, ready for colouring. I'm not sure quite sure of its historical accuracy, but over at Purim: A Festival of Gladness [ezra.mts.jhu.edu/~rabbiars/purim/], you'll find out how to make an origami Haman's hat. If you want to try making a real crown, you can find detailed, illustrated instructions online for a beaded crown. The project calls for glow-in-the-dark beads that will make your favourite Queen Esther beam [www.chadiscrafts.nu/fun/crown.html].

You can find more Purim links at Jewish.com [www.jewish.com/search/Holidays/Purim/] and at Maven [www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx127.htm]. A couple of Web sites are geared toward teachers, such as Virtual Jerusalem's Educator's Guide [www.vjholidays.com/purim/educators_guide.htm] and The Joint Authority for Jewish Zionist Education [www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/purim/index.html]. Kids will be particularly interested in the links Purim Fun and Activities for Younger Children. (Just don't tell them they are educational.)

If you'd like to drop someone a line for Purim, you can, thanks to some colourful (and free) cyber-postcards. You can choose from a few at greetings.com [www.123greetings.com/events/purim/] or some animated Purim postcards at the Care2 site [www.care2.com/send/categories/Purim].

My favourite postcard is geared to adults. It mixes old and new and tells us that royal courts haven't changed much in a couple of thousand years [www. cards4you.com/jewish/purim/] The postcard comes from Dry Bones creator Ya'acov Kirschen with this caption: "King Achashverosh saw that Esther was indeed fair to behold, so he turned to his advisor and said: 'Get me the name of that cute intern.'"

Next week: Purim fun, games and food on the Internet.

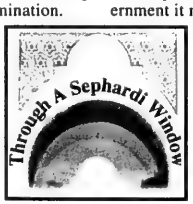
Exploring unity government

Ariel Sharon wins the election by a 25 percent margin. Ehud Barak is voted out of office. Defeated, Barak announces his withdrawal from political life. In utter disarray, the left-wing coalition bickers in incrimination.

In order to form a unity coalition, Sharon offers Barak a position in the new regime. Shimon Peres, the elder statesmen of the left and father of Oslo cries foul. Then, he too is offered a ministry and accepts. Sharon calls Benjamin Netanyahu with a similar offering. Netanyahu declines. Surely, no one believes that Barak, Peres and Sharon can all align their conflicting politics for long.



What does the new Israeli government of unity really mean?

I am not an expert of political science, but then again I don't propose to be an expert in anything. Yet, I still write and speak, so why should political analysis be any different. Allow me then, to toss my two cents worth in the hat.

If Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon indeed pulls off this feat of unity government it means:

- The Oslo accord has finally been put to rest, and a new approach is under way.
- There is no significant left wing anymore.
- This is vintage Barak, effortlessly zigzagging from one position to another.
- Both Barak and Peres concluded that only by holding to their positions of influence could they then hope to make a comeback in a post-Sharon era.
- Sharon can now excuse any failings he will realize in the search for peace by hiding behind these two most prominent pro-peace politicians.
- Sharon can use the goodwill of Barak and Peres to soften his image as an arch-hawk and legitimize himself within the international arena.
- Sharon is also desperately looking for legitimacy within Israel itself, when only 35 percent of eligible voters participated in the worst election turnout ever.
- By enlisting Barak and Peres into his inner circle, Sharon hopes to harness them and save himself from any political embarrassments, especially from Peres' well-known aptitude to go his own contrarian way.
- A mockery of democracy has been committed, when a whole country has spoken by casting its vote for one ideology, and supposedly against the other, yet that same government proceeds to incorporate that very opposition.
- The differences that have been dusted under the rug will eventually resurface.

Finally, if Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon's unity government manoeuvre succeeds, it will be the mark of a brilliant politician.

Toronto Police Services releases hate crimes report

Mideast violence cited as one cause

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mideast violence echoed as far as Toronto last year, with the conflict being blamed for a number of anti-Semitic attacks in the city.

The hate crimes unit of Toronto Police Services released its annual report for 2000 last week, showing that while overall hate crimes were down over the year before, the number of anti-Jewish attacks stayed the same.

In other words, anti-Semitic crimes were up proportionally, especially in the autumn, and the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians is blamed.

There were 35 religion-related occurrences last year, and all but one were directed at Jews. This is consistent with previous years, when nearly all faith-related attacks related to Jews.

"In 2000, the number of anti-Semitic occurrences [was] proportionally higher than previous years due to the recent escalation in the Middle East conflict," states the 21-page report, available at www.torontopolice.on.ca.

The report was issued on the heels on the annual League for Human Rights audit, which showed a five percent rise in the number of anti-Semitic incidents across Canada, with nearly 40 percent of those in Toronto (see story, page 3).

Toronto police say the number of overall hate crimes was down last year.

The hate crimes unit received 204 hate-related offences, a 30 percent drop over the 1999 total of 292. Police say the decrease can be attributed to better awareness and community-based programs.

Assaults, mischief and threats were the most frequent hate crimes last year. Wilful promotion of hate dropped to 20 reported incidents, from 53 the year before.

Of all hate crimes, racial attacks led the way, with 46 percent of all incidents. Attacks based on religion accounted for 17 percent of the total.

The most victimized segment of the population were Blacks, followed by Jews. There were 18 reported crimes against gays and lesbians.

However, the majority of all hate crimes in October, when the latest round of Middle East violence was still fresh, were anti-Semitic.

The breakdown for 2000 shows that of the 35 religion-related offences, 34 were directed at Jews. Fourteen offences based on religion involved mischief, eight were threats, five were assaults, three were bomb threats, four involved wilful promotion of hate and one advocated genocide.

(The numbers under the "nationality" category show one "Israeli," and Jewish communal leaders are counting that toward the total.)

Most occur on Fridays, Mondays

Six of the anti-Jewish attacks involved bomb threats and mischief (usually graffiti) directed at synagogues.

Most hate crimes in 2000 took place on Fridays and Mondays, the report shows.

Last year, 38 reported hate crimes were concluded with charges. Of those, 15 cases were concluded, and 23 remain before the courts.

The majority of all hate crimes, including ones targeting Jews, took place within the jurisdiction of downtown's 52 Division.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said that while he's heartened by the overall drop in hate crimes last year, "it's troubling that anti-Semitic attacks remained unchanged. Even in a society as civilized as Canada, we need to maintain vigilance."

Anti-Semitic incidents soar in '00

doors and windows. One of the synagogues had the word "Palestine" scrawled on the wall.

The October attacks in Canada coincided with a worldwide outbreak. "All across Europe, synagogues were vandalized or completely destroyed, and Jews were the victims of violence and harassment worldwide," the report states.

"Although several specific assaults were purported to be committed by Arab-Canadians, it is suspected that most of the incidents reported during this period were acts of opportunistic hate groups or individual anti-Semites, who used Middle East tension as an excuse or catalyst for their expressions of hatred," the report states.

One Glen Park reinvents the condominium

If the free spirit in you rebels at the notion of "downsizing" as you grow older, you'll be happy to know that at least one developer agrees with you.

David Feldman, who heads Camrost-Felcorp, is pleased to announce the start of construction at One Glen Park, an exclusive collection of condominium residences which sets a new standard in elegant living. It's only fitting that this development should occur in North York, where Camrost-Felcorp's previous successes include Village Gate, the Madison Centre, the Residences of Manhattan and Madison, and the Hollywood Plaza Grand Regent.

Gourmet kitchen with state-of-the-art appliances: everything a cook could want

Barbara Klein, Community Sales Manager for Camrost-Felcorp, is well-acquainted with the frustration of prospective buyers who dread being shoehorned into smaller quarters — and their elation at finding an alternative. "Downsizing sounds great, until you're the one being downsized," she says. "This project is not just another condominium; it's a solution for people who want to not only maintain their existing lifestyle, but enhance it." Those disenchanted with boxlike offerings at other projects have found, with One Glen Park, that "they're not losing a home, they're moving into a better one. It's a house in condo's clothing," says Klein.

Keeping Shabbos dinner where it belongs

Many have been so taken with the concept that they've purchased multiple units, and customized them to their taste — effectively building a brand new "dream home."

Equal space, with amenities galore — and without the hassles of property maintenance and security. What does it all mean?

It means Shabbos dinner for 20 is still Shabbos dinner for 20 — in your own home, not at your daughter's because you don't have room. It means you can still "run a restaurant" in your kitchen — a new, state-of-the-art kitchen that will make cooking for family and friends a greater pleasure than ever. (For larger gatherings, the well-appointed party room has kitchenette facilities suitable for on-site catering).

It means that when they visit, your children and grandchildren can surf the web to their hearts' content on the Rogers Wave high-speed connection.

This feature, notes Klein, is typical of One Glen Park's intrinsic value and attention to detail. "The quality is built in from floor to ceiling," she beams. "Features that are extra elsewhere are standard here."

Among many others, these features include spacious balconies, nine-foot ceilings in the main living areas, designer kitchens with state-of-the-art appliances, and elegant master ensuite baths complete with whirlpool.

You'll also enjoy private underground parking, an attentive concierge, and two custom-designed elevators, with one serving as a Shabbos elevator.

Ironclad security means you can pick up and leave at a moment's notice and travel without having to worry about your property or your vehicle.

One Glen Park also offers a number of other features other condos don't, like individual heating and cooling pumps, so you don't get stuck with inflated bills from shared heating and air conditioning. A complete fitness centre will allow you to enjoy the benefits of exercise year-round, as well as a rejuvenating steam shower.

As the Crown Jewel of Camrost-Felcorp's "Signature Collection", One Glen Park offers an array of options and finishes limited only to your imagination. Most buyers, she says, are taking full advantage — especially at the pre-construction prices in effect as of this writing.

Perhaps the greatest advantage of One Glen Park is its location. For those who've spent the better part of their adult lives in the Bathurst / Glencairn area, moving into One Glen Park means remaining connected to the old and familiar — shopping, restaurants, bakeries, synagogues. As one buyer noted, "You don't know how much it means to be able to walk to shul, the same shul I've gone to for 30 years — and to know that I'm still within walking distance of my children."

Last chance for pre-construction prices

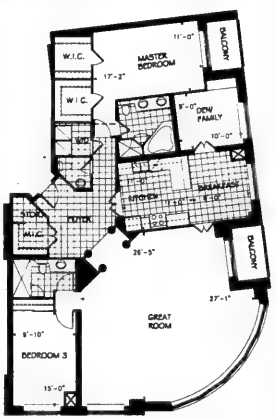
In the broader sense, living at One Glen Park means being part of a community, says Klein. Many purchasers to date were friends or neighbours to begin with, and were drawn to the project by word of mouth. Underscoring the neighbourly feeling is a main lobby, complete with fireplace, that would be the envy of the Waldorf Astoria. Upon seeing the artist's rendering, one buyer was moved to declare, "I guess now I'll have to wear designer shorts to pick up the mail!" — to which his wife retorted, "it's about time!"



"House in condo's clothing": maintaining and enhancing a lifestyle

Units range in price from $300,800 to just over $1 million, with considerable savings still available on a variety of features and options. Designer shorts are negotiable.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rediscovered Images of Jerusalem 1927-1967 is really a misnomer, if you want to be picky.

Judging by a preview of the photographic exhibit, which runs at the Koffler Centre of the Arts until April 1, the photos are not strictly about Jerusalem.

Elia Kahvedjian's trove of black and white photographs, brought to town by the New Israel Fund of Canada, transcends Jerusalem.

Among the photos on display are bucolic vistas of pre-state Israel, with pleasing views of Tiberias, Jaffa and the Jordan and Yarkon Rivers.

Yet the real emphasis is on Jerusalem, a city of intense historical and religious memories and animosities.

Kahvedjian, an Armenian resident of Jerusalem, seems to have had no political agenda when he set out to evoke the ethereal spirit of Jerusalem.

Guided solely by esthetic considerations, he captured the realities of a city home to Jews, Muslims and Christians.

In 1947, when Arab-Jewish tensions exploded into inter-communal warfare, Kahvedjian packed his negatives into boxes and put them into storage for safekeeping.

Forty years later, his son, Kevork, stumbled upon the cache and catalogued and printed the invaluable collection.

At the insistence of Kevork's wife, Hasmik, the pictures were exhibited for the first time in 1993 at the American Colony Hotel in eastern Jerusalem.

And now, thanks to Minda Davis of the New Israel Fund, these mostly magnificent photographs are here for all to examine and admire.

In the main, they deal with day-to-day life: Jews praying at the Western Wall, distracted haredim hurrying off to an unknown destination, an Arab woman smoking a nargila, a Jewish beggar waiting for alms, Arab water carriers posing for the camera in front of the Al-Aksa mosque, a Western woman, seated on a donkey, riding toward the Damascus Gate.

Only one photo, of British policemen frisking a group of Arabs with their arms raised, hints at the endemic strife that convulsed Palestine from the 1920s onward.

The urban and rural landscapes are particularly striking and appealing.

There is a panoramic aerial view of Jerusalem's Old City, circa 1936, and a jumble of low buildings on the edge of the desolate Judean Desert.

Kahvedjian's impressions of the Mughrabi Quarter and the Jewish Quarter of the 1930s evoke a kind of biblical timelessness.

His 1935 rendering of Mea Shearim, the haredi neighbourhood, is mind boggling. Amid a scattering of low-slung buildings, cattle graze contentedly in an airy pasture. Today, Mea Shearim is a study in urban congestion.

Two of his finest photos are of a silhouetted Palestinian woman in traditional embroidered garb walking toward sunlight, and of the graceful arches framing the Via Delorosa.

Kahvedjian's composition of the Western Wall plaza, snapped shortly after the 1967 Six Day War, is similarly impressive, as is his 1929 photo of Jews praying there amid a gaggle of Muslim onlookers.

Perhaps the most intriguing photo is of a dirigible – the Graf Zeppelin – floating serenely over Jerusalem in 1936. It looks remarkably like a scud missile!

Among his most evocative photographs are pastoral scenes of an empty rowboat drifting on the Sea of Galilee near Tiberias's weathered seawall, of two Muslim men praying on the banks of the Yarkon River, of three puffed-up sail boats caught on a mudflat on the Yarkon, of three Jewish men relaxing on a bench facing the placid Jordan River, of a kaffiyeh-clad Arab man in Jaffa gazing meditatively at the Mediterranean Sea, of a camel train trudging along the seashore.

If nothing else, this batch of pristine photos highlights the unspoiled, rustic beauty of the countryside as it was more than 60 years ago, and underscore the lamentable fact that the march of time has despoiled the environment.

Tanenbaum's treasures to be displayed at ROM

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A treasure trove of ancient antiquities, donated to the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) last year by local philanthropists Joey and Toby Tanenbaum, will be displayed in a forthcoming exhibition.

Just Uncrated: Masterpieces from the Tanenbaum Gift is scheduled to be open to the public from April 21 to Sept. 3, ROM announced recently.

"We are delighted to share this exceptional gift from Joey and Toby Tanenbaum," said William Thorsell, ROM's president and chief executive officer.

"Our staff moved quickly to put these treasures on display as soon as we could."

In a milestone of philanthropy last November, the Tanenbaums turned over their $104 million collection of Middle Eastern, Asian and European art to ROM.

It was then described as the largest single gift to a cultural institution in Canadian history.

Joey Tanenbaum, a member of ROM's board of trustees and an active member of Toronto's Jewish community, is head of Jay-M Enterprises Ltd.

A recipient of the Order of Canada, he is the grandson of Abraham Tanenbaum, a Polish Jew who settled in Canada in 1911.

The collection consists of 1,800 pieces, two-thirds of which are Chinese artifacts.

ROM curators selected over 1,000 objects for Just Uncrated.

It features archeologically significant cult objects from Syria, Iraq, Turkey, Egypt, Afghanistan, Spain and the Balkans.

Among the highlights:

- A Syrian ceramic mould from the second millennium BCE used to produce clay figures.
- Three-foot tomb figures of horses, camels and humans from the Han and Tang dynasties.
- Chinese ceramic relief tiles portraying mythological animals from a two-headed bird to a four-eyed horse.
- Money trees, five to six feet in height, with coins growing from their bronze branches.
- An ornate Egyptian cartonnage originally used in the mummy-wrapping process.

When the exhibit closes, the Tanenbaum collection will be integrated into ROM's permanent and temporary galleries.

Pottery figure of a female, Danube region, 1500-1200 BCE.

Camel with rider, China, Tang dynasty, 618-906 CE.

Body piercing on agenda at study smorgasbord

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is no halachic ruling against body piercing, Rabbi Matthew Kaufman told a mostly teenage audience recently.

The new director of Camp Ramah in Canada made it clear, however, that the three major denominations of Judaism – as well as Camp Ramah itself – discourage the practice. Just because something is not forbidden, doesn't mean it is acceptable, he explained.

The session on Body Piercing and Tattooing was part of the first annual Torah 'N T.O., a study and dinner event held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and sponsored by the Canadian Region of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism as well as more than a dozen affiliated groups or institutions.

First annual Torah 'N T.O. held at Beth Emeth

About 130 adults and teens attended two sessions each, choosing among 11 offerings including Ethical Dilemmas for Families (led by Daniel Goldberg of Beth Tzedec Congregation), Cain & Abel (taught by Michelle Wenner of United Synagogue Day School specifically for parents and teens), Jerusalem: Modern Issues and Dilemmas (Conservative shlichah Karni Goldshmid-Lahav) and Law & Custom in Jewish Ritual (Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue).

"It was a wonderful program," said Shirley Gossack, executive director of the Canadian region of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, following the event. Response from participants was so positive that organizers plan to repeat the program – originally conceived as an annual event – twice next year, in the fall and again next spring.

"It was an opportunity for all ages to sit together and study, just for the love of it," said Gossack.

Rabbi Kaufman's topic obviously resonated for the teens, two of whom had tiny studs in their nose and one of whom said she had a navel piercing.

"Why do you want to know what the Torah has to say if you've made a personal choice already?" asked the rabbi in a manner reflecting curiosity, not malice.

Abbey Wolfe, 17, who attended with her mother Fran, wanted to know why society accepts her nose ring and Judaism doesn't, to the extent she feels it's regarded as an "ethical flaw."

"That's got to make you not feel too great about the choice – or about Judaism," commented the rabbi.

Wolfe, an affiliated Conservative Jew, said she doesn't regret her choice.

Although there is some "grey area for discussion," Rabbi Kaufman said everyone agrees that Judaism opposes self-mutilation. Piercings do not represent "a cut-and-dried situation" the way deliberate wrist-slashing or "branding" with heated steel would, he noted.

Earrings, on the other hand, have been accepted for many centuries, Rabbi Kaufman said. He even cited a Gemarah source indicating that earrings were acceptable for men.

Both the Reform and Conservative movements have published teshuvot against body piercing, and Camp Ramah has a policy barring staff from wearing piercings other than earrings, he noted.

Some of the questions surrounding piercing are whether it's dangerous and whether the purpose is to beautify or deface, said the rabbi.

Permanency of the piercing is also an issue, he indicated. "There would be an objection in Halachah to permanent marks," he said, referring to holes that would not close once the jewelry was removed. A nose stud or a navel piercing would not necessarily be regarded as permanent, he said.

Another key issue is modesty, or tzniut. Rabbi Kaufman noted, however, that even within Jewish circles there is disagreement on how modesty is to be expressed.

"When you walk around with a halter top, yes, we do have an issue," he said, referring specifically to navel piercing.

He dismissed as a bubbe mayse the common belief that one cannot be buried in a Jewish cemetery because of a tattoo.

Certainly in the case of someone who was tattooed against their will, it's not an issue, he said. And for the most part, he noted, tattoos in today's world do not indicate pagan worship or criminal links, the original basis for the prohibition.

Health show cancels anti-Semitic speaker

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Organizers of the Total Health 2001 show have pulled the plug on an anti-Semitic speaker whose c.v. includes dissemination of crude, medieval blood libels and promotion of Jewish conspiracy theories.

The Consumer Health Organization of Canada (CHOC) announced in a release that it was cancelling the speaking engagement of U.S. author Eustace Mullins after it learned of Mullins' "early writings in which he challenged the authenticity of Holocaust reports and made several unfounded anti-Semitic slurs."

The announcement came only one day after a senior CHOC spokesperson dismissed calls to cancel Mullins' speaking engagement. John Gardon, a founding member of the organization, told the National Post the controversy over Mullins is "excellent publicity. People will want to hear his side of the story."

His wife, CHOC president Libby Gardon, said she had known Mullins for years and had never heard him make any anti-Semitic remarks. "He's a respected author. He's a gentle man," she is quoted as saying.

Sponsors, CJC, politicians put pressure on show's organizer

The CHOC cancellation came after mounting pressure from show sponsors, the political arena and Canadian Jewish Congress.

The CHOC's cavalier dismissal of concerns about Mullins' presence angered four alternative health organizations that had been listed as sponsors of the show. Spokespersons for Noah's Natural Foods, the Big Carrot and Omega Centre Bookstore said they were pulling out of the show while a spokesperson for Baldwin Natural Foods said the collective management was "shocked" that Mullins was scheduled to speak.

Meanwhile, NDP leader Howard Hampton wrote to Ontario Premier Mike Harris, calling on him to cancel the CHOC's contract to use the government-owned Metro Toronto Convention Centre if Mullins' speaking engagement was not rescinded.

Harris, speaking to reporters in Stoney Creek, Ont., said if Mullins' "views are... contrary to the laws of Canada, I don't know why Canada's letting him in in the first place."

Congress, which distributed a substantial file on Mullins and his written work, was pleased his invitation was cancelled. "There is no question as to Mullins' credentials as an anti-Semite and we are heartened by the knowledge that he will not be given a platform in Canada from which to purvey his racist agenda," said Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

Mullins has a lengthy history of promoting Jewish conspiracies. He appears often in the dossiers of organizations that track anti-Semites.

In his New History of the Jews, Mullins claims Jews are "carriers" of communism and "furry scavengers who have found their way through the sewers into every civilized place..."

In The Secret Holocaust, he describes in gruesome detail a fantastic medieval blood libel in which "Jews, their eyes filled with blood lust and hatred of the gentiles, gather around the [Christian] child and pierce its flesh and drink its blood and call down curses upon the name of Jesus Christ."

Mullins had also written that Jew were poisoning American children through the Polio vaccine and he claims Jews control the U.S. banking system.

Libby Gardon credited Canadian Jewish Congress with providing documentation about Mullins' written works, which prompted her to cancel his appearance.

"I invited Mullins after hearing him speak when he didn't make any racist remarks," she said in a press release. "But we now know more about his early works and cannot endorse his participation."

The CHOC Web site indicated Mullins had been scheduled to discuss "the Rockefeller medical monopoly: the hidden forces behind the myths of modern medicine."

However, in its news release, the CHOC said Mullins was to join other speakers "including Jewish author Leonard Horowitz, in exploring contemporary genocides." The speakers were to discuss aspects of genocide "largely overlooked by the mainstream, including those who benefit most, financially and otherwise, from fear and hate."

The release then quotes Horowitz saying "a classic example of this is Henry Kissinger, hailed as a hero by unwitting Jewish organizations, yet currently exposed as a war criminal in this month's Harper's magazine. Most people don't realize Kissinger was excommunicated from the Jewish religion on June 20, 1976, during a religious ceremony presided over by five member rabbis of the Supreme Rabbinic Court of America, partly for helping top Nazi war criminals to escape from Germany at the close of the war."

The relevance of that assertion to the Mullins issue is unclear, and Gardon did not return CJN calls for an interview.

Joseph Mapa

Joseph Mapa takes reins as Mount Sinai's president, CEO

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joseph Mapa, new president and CEO of Mount Sinai hospital, is passionate about the hospital and the hospital's role, which he sees as providing the best, most compassionate care possible to its patients.

"Hospitals are about patients, it's that simple," he said.

Mapa, 50, assumed his new position on Jan. 1, succeeding Ted Freedman, who had just retired. Born in Haifa, Mapa came to the hospital in 1977 as executive assistant to the executive director and chief executive officer. Later, he was chief operating officer.

Mapa is assistant professor in the department of health administration at the University of Toronto and past president of the society of graduates in health administration.

He has written extensively on health care management issues, and has received the Ontario Regent's Award for distinguished leadership in the field of health care, in 1997, as well as a literary award for a publication on organizational ethics by the Society of Graduates in Health Administration. Last year, he earned the society's Leadership Achievement Award "in recognition of his academic contributions and leadership in role modelling life-long education and professional redevelopment as a form of adapting to change and environmental trends."

Mapa's vision, he told The CJN, is for Mount Sinai to be in "the same league as the world's great hospitals, like Johns Hopkins and Massachusetts General Hospital." What that means to him is "providing the best care, with state of the art technology, the best physical environment, and care that is humanistic and compassionate. That's what a world-class hospital is about."

He wants to build on Mount Sinai's current strengths, which he sees as women's and infants' health, advanced surgical subspecialties, and research.

At the same time, he said, the institution must adapt to important trends, such as discoveries in the field of genetics.

Mapa also depends on the "talented staff, a fantastic community, and an unparalleled group of trustees and officers, led by chairman of the board Bernard Ghert," he said.

Both he and the hospital are blessed to have this calibre of supporters, and "individuals with such deep emotional ties to its future."

Health care, he said, is going through tremendous changes. "Demography, technological advances, consumer awareness, as well as funding cutbacks, are creating an unprecedented demand on our hospitals.

"We must reflect on these matters so as to respond in the most effective and responsible way."

One way to do this, he said, is concentrating on "being the best at what you do, focusing on key centres of excellence, like our gastro-intestinal departments, and on maintaining strong community ties."

Mapa mused that "It is wonderful to hear how much pride the Jewish community takes in in the facility they have built on University Avenue for the entire community."

He prefers not to dwell on recent battles the hospital has had to face, such as government funding cutbacks and hospital amalgamations and closings.

"We have a fantastic hospital. I truly believe that everyone involved, notwithstanding the profound challenges, is enthusiastic and vibrant about the future."

There is no question that Mapa is.

"I love this hospital," he said. "I think it's an extraordinary place, and I mean that."

Chaviva Hoûsek heads scientific research body

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chaviva Hošek has landed on her feet – again.

This time, the Jewish dynamo is heading the Toronto-based Canadian Institute for Advanced Research (CIAR), a one-of-a-kind but little-known concern that is at the leading edge of scientific inquiry.

That's why the multi-talented Hošek is busy these days boning up on such esoteric matters as superconductivity and nanotechnology. Good thing she's a quick study.

"Well, I'm not expected to be an expert in all the matters before us," she says. "But I want to be at least conversant in them."

It seems a pretty far cry from the job Hošek held for the previous seven years. As Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's director of policy and research, she crafted all three Liberal Red Books and was among Chrétien's closest "back room" advisers.

Many will also remember her as the rookie housing minister, from 1987 to 1989, in the Ontario government of David Peterson.

The daughter of Holocaust survivors has built a stellar resumé through four careers, and counting. A McGill University graduate and Harvard PhD in English literature (specializing in the poetry of Walt Whitman), Hošek taught English at the University of Toronto for 13 years, then served as president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, helping to raise that group's profile considerably.

Chaviva Hošek

After a brief stint as a pension analyst, she turned to provincial politics, winning a downtown NDP stronghold but failing to win re-election when Peterson's Liberals were dumped.

In 1990, she was tapped by Chrétien, then the Opposition leader, to draft nothing less than a complete roadmap for a government-in-waiting.

Now firmly ensconced in an airy office, a stone's throw from Bay Street, Hošek, 54, ruminates on why she left a job at the prime minister's elbow, to something most Canadians have never heard of.

"It's a major transition," she allows, "but it was time for one."

So what is the CIAR?

Physically, it's an office in downtown Toronto, but on another scale, it's been described as a university without walls. Founded in 1982 by Dr. Fraser Mustard, who discovered how aspirin benefits heart attack and stroke patients, the institute links and funds a network of top Canadian scientists and facilitates the formation of partnerships among them so that new, groundbreaking research can take place.

"We don't fund research directly," Hošek notes. "We give scientists the resources to do more research and help them build intellectual bridges with other experts.

"It's the only such concept in the world," she notes.

Because Canada is so sparsely populated, and its best minds can be strung out across thousands of miles, the CIAR develops "groupings" of scientists from interrelated fields, and encourages them to work together in key areas.

Currently, there are some 190 physicists, economists, chemists and social scientists associated with the institute, from universities and research facilities in Canada and around the world. Funding from the institute allows them to take leave from their jobs to concentrate on pure research, as well as to travel to meetings and symposia, where ideas are swapped and relationships built.

Private and corporate donations account for one-third of the institute's $10 million budget, with the rest split by the federal government and the provinces.

The institute is also seen as a bulwark against the brain drain to the United States, because it allows Canadian universities to recruit star candidates who have built a proven track record.

"It helps create Canadian strength on the ground," Hošek says. "It tries to transcend the usual Canadian problem of strength across a large area by creating a critical mass."

CIAR scientists tackle complex issues in eight areas: cosmology and gravity, economic growth and policy, Earth system evolution, human development, evolutionary biology, population health, nanoelectronics, and superconductivity.

Research in several disciplines has made an impact: The population health program's findings apparently impressed Ontario Premier Mike Harris enough to pump millions of dollars into early childhood development. And prompted by the institute's research in a relatively new field, population health, the federal government set up a department to examine how income, employment, and education affect health.

Other research areas are just plain head-spinning: the very origins of stars and the universe; how life on Earth evolved; materials and technology that will revolutionize communications.

"This is about creating and maintaining intellectual leadership in Canada," Hošek says. The job, she adds, also allows her to be in the same city as her husband of 20 years, Alan Pearson, a consultant.

Hošek was born in the Bohemian town of Chomutov and raised in Montreal by Hungarian-speaking parents who had survived death camps and forced labour battalions. Emil, her father, hailed from Ungvar (then in Hungary, later to become part of Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union), and died in 1966. Her mother, Hedy, who was born in Vinograd (whose ownership bounced among Czechoslovakia, Hungary, the Soviet Union and Ukraine), is now 73 and lives in New York.

As the child of Holocaust survivors, Hošek was well placed to prepare Chrétien for his 1999 visit to Auschwitz, giving him a French copy of Elie Wiesel's Night beforehand.

"He was stunned," she recalls. "He said, 'This is why Canada is so important.'" The death camp itself left Chrétien "much more distressed than he expected. It was much worse than he thought it would be."

She chooses her words carefully in defending her former boss from accusations that he's insensitive to the concerns of the Jewish community. He was, after all, the first Canadian PM to visit Auschwitz as well as Israel, Hošek points out.

"He has a real delicacy of feelings for peoples' identities. He's not a demonstrative person, but he knows what it's like to be a minority."

Whether poetry, politics or planets, Hošek sees a continuum in her work. After all, Walt Whitman too was "omnivorous" when it came to all that life offers.

Students practising Jewish values outside classroom

Avrum Rosensweig

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bar and bat mizvah students gathered recently with their families to discuss the difference even one child can make.

The Beth Tzedec Congregational School class focused on some of the children and adults who have responded to needs in their communities and, through their actions, made a difference.

Avrum Rosensweig, the founder of Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, said that part of being bar-mitzvahed is about learning to take responsibility for your own mitzvot.

"Now that you're getting older, as Jews, as human beings, and as part of the world, it is your turn to take responsibility for those things that your parents did for you before.

"It's time for you guys to think outside yourselves. Judaism says that you have to be aware that there are other people out there who need our help," Rosensweig said.

"Your challenge is to go out into the world and figure out how to make other lives better and the world stronger."

As an example of how it is possible to make a difference, Rosensweig spoke to students and parents about the history of his own organization.

About five or six years ago, when things were going very badly in Rwanda and Yugoslavia, Rosensweig said, there didn't seem to be a formal response to the needs of those people.

But what was incredible, he said, was that when approached, "the response from the community was great.

"If you ask people for help, they will say yes."

In a short while, Rosensweig found himself responding to the needs of Kiev and Romania. Now the organization has a head office in Toronto and is responding to suffering all over the world.

"Ve'ahavta now looks to help wherever it can," he said. Recently, the organization brought a little seven-year-old girl from Guyana to The Hospital for Sick Children for a heart operation. It also launched a medical program in Zimbabwe and has responded to the earthquakes in India and El Salvador.

"You can help at any age," Rosensweig told the group. "In fact, often the younger you are, the more successful you can be.

"We are the ones that people are relying on, and we are the ones who are fortunate enough to have the potential to make changes."

Alex Apostol, 16, from Free the Children, spoke to the group about the founder of his organization, Craig Kielburger.

About five years ago, Craig, a 12-year-old Thornhill boy, stumbled on an article about a child in India who was murdered for speaking up against child labour.

"That day, Craig started researching everything he could about child labour," Apostol explained.

Craig then took seven weeks off school to go to India and different parts of Asia to see the problem firsthand.

Armed with information and knowledge, Craig enlisted the help of his friends and formed Free The Children to raise money and awareness about child labour.

"Today the organization has over 100,000 members in 27 different countries."

The important thing to remember is that you each have it within you to do something, Apostol told the group. Decide on an issue, empower yourself with knowledge and then get right into the act, speaking out and getting others involved.

The bar and bat mizvah families then worked on a list of differences that they could make – from the mitzvah of bikur cholim (visiting the sick) to conducting clothing drives for individuals in need.

At the end of the program, the students and their parents made sandwiches for Na Me Res, the Native Men's Shelter, to take in its van that night to give to the homeless.

Daniel Goldberg, the director of education and youth at the Beth Tzedec Congregational School, said that "one of the guiding principles of our tradition and ultimate purpose of the community is tikkun olam – the healing and transformation of the world.

"We want the kids to learn that being Jewish is more than just ritual; it can also extend to their day-to-day life. They can bring their own special traditions to the larger world and they have the ability to make a difference."

Beth Tzedec class focuses on helping others

"This is clearly just the beginning for you and your families," said Netta Zweig, Beth Tzedec's family educator who co-ordinated the program.

"Hopefully, you will be inspired to take these thoughts home with you and carry out some of these ideas once the program is over."

* * *

Since the class, Goldberg said, a few students and parents have called his office to report that they have initiated some of their own "making a difference" programs in their schools.

Shlichah links Conservative Jews to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For many Diaspora Jews, being in Israel means feeling part of the majority.

But for Karni Goldshmid-Lahav, a seventh-generation Jerusalemite and the shlichah to the North American Conservative movement, it's been almost exactly the opposite. Goldshmid-Lahav, 29, is enjoying her posting in New York, in part because she no longer feels in the minority as a Masorti (Conservative) Jew.

Karni Goldshmid-Lahav

Although Israel's Masorti movement has grown to more than 30,000 members – over half of them native Israelis – ignorance and anti-Masorti incidents are not uncommon.

Last July's arson attack on the Masorti synagogue Ya'ar Ramot "didn't break our spirit," said Goldshmid-Lahav recently at Toronto's Israel Aliyah Centre. She was in town for a long weekend to meet with Conservative rabbis, students, lay people and potential olim.

Recently, she noted, two young Israeli women – part of a Masorti program involving an extra year of army service – challenged the denial of their right to lay tfillin in a military synagogue. "The fact that a young woman feels she can fight the army is a good sign," Goldshmid-Lahav said.

An emissary of the Jewish Agency, Goldshmid-Lahav – the first woman in her position – divides her time between the offices of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and New York's aliyah centre, providing connections between North American Conservative Jews and local educational programs, or particular types of programs or congregations in Israel.

She believes more aliyah of pluralist-minded North Americans would strengthen the Masorti movement in Israel. A big part of her message is the importance of Israel as part of a "complete" Jewish identity. That doesn't necessarily involve aliyah, she clarified – it could mean having a second home or planning a bar or bat mitzvah in Israel, or becoming more familiar with the Hebrew language.

She also suggests the Masorti Web site, www.masorti.org.il, as "a good way to get connected and be in touch."

Prior to leaving Israel three months ago, Goldshmid-Lahav was national director of education for Masorti Judaism, providing educational programs for nearly 50 Masorti congregations.

Her own educational journey from (non-Haredi) Orthodoxy to Conservative Judaism was "a long voyage, but fascinating," she said.

Casually attired in a sweater, blue jeans and work boots – a far cry from the skirts she wore as a schoolgirl – Goldshmid-Lahav said she was well versed in and still observes Halachah, but wanted to explore philosophical ideas.

"I found the Masorti movement fit like a hand to a glove... It was what I was looking for. I didn't know it had a name."

Her immediate family was not prejudiced against Masorti, she said, but "in the beginning they didn't realize exactly what it was."

Before discovering Masorti, Goldshmid-Lahav served in the IDF, spent time at a women's yeshiva, and pursued an undergraduate degree in Jewish philosophy at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Her quest to learn about "the women's point of view" in Judaism led her to the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies (the Jerusalem affiliate of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary) where she studied for a master's degree in gender studies. It was through Machon Schechter, as it is known in Hebrew, that Goldshmid-Lahav learned about the Masorti movement.

She believes Israelis are starting to understand what Masorti means. It's difficult, she noted, because national security is a more pressing issue, and Masorti Jews are a minority.

Among the challenges, Masorti marriages and conversions are not recognized by the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel. Her own wedding last April to Uri Lahav, an occupational therapist, included Masorti elements along with the traditional Orthodox ceremony.

Ironically, she noted, the majority of Israelis define themselves as traditional (the meaning of the Hebrew word masorti). Movement leaders originally thought Masorti Judaism would appeal to those who "make kiddush every Shabbat, who want to practise their Judaism but don't want to be pressured."

"But still, for the majority," she said wryly, "the shul they don't go to is Orthodox."

"It's okay to be Orthodox, Reform, Masorti or secular – as long as you respect the other side," she said. "I think we can show people that [Masorti] takes Judaism very seriously, and letting other people express their Judaism is the most important achievement, except for peace, of course."

Barak's peace efforts termed 'unrealistic'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak's "honest and courageous" attempt to reach an end-of-conflict agreement with the Palestinians was ultimately "unrealistic," one of Israel's leading political analysts said recently.

"It wasn't in the cards," Asher Susser declared in a talk at the northern Jewish Community Centre.

Asher Susser

Barak's quest for a comprehensive accord foundered on the rocks of the Palestinian demand to resolve the Arab refugee issue at Israel's expense, noted Susser, former director of and now senior fellow at the Moshe Dayan centre for Middle Eastern studies at Tel Aviv University.

By way of explaining the complexity of the Palestinian problem, Susser said that Israel's rapprochement with Egypt and later with Jordan had been possible because existential issues were not at stake.

Once Israel withdrew to the internationally recognized borders, its basic conflict with these Arab states essentially ended.

The Palestinian refugee question, however, does not lend itself to such a cut-and-dried approach, since Israel's future as a state of the Jewish people would be compromised demographically if it accepted masses of Arab refugees, Susser argued.

Ehud Barak

Israeli leaders cannot satisfy the Palestinians' insistence on the "right of return" because Israel will neither recognize its validity nor accept responsibility for its occurrence.

"We will not do that unless we develop a suicidal intent," said Susser, who subsequently spoke at Temple Sinai and York University.

In Yasser Arafat's mind, the refugee issue defines Palestinian identity, history and aspirations, and he will not concede that point.

That is why he disregarded stringent deadlines set respectively by former U.S. president Bill Clinton and outgoing prime minister Barak in recent negotiations at Camp David and Taba.

In Susser's estimation, the Palestinians are basically saying to Israel, 'Kindly redefine yourself and let the refugees in.'

By harping on the "right of return," the Palestinian leadership undermines "the logic of partition," the two-state idea at the root of the Oslo peace process.

Jews should not and cannot become a minority in their own country, Susser said.

Consequently, the Palestinian refugee issue should be deferred for now.

In his view, the Israeli government should try to negotiate interim agreements with the Palestinians. This would require Israel to vacate the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and to dismantle Jewish settlements, the construction of which was a mistake.

If the Palestinians balk, Israel may have to act unilaterally, he warned.

Describing himself as a "territorial dove" and a centrist, Susser said that Israel can best protect its essence as a state of the Jewish people by returning to the pre-1967 boundaries and withdrawing from Arab areas of eastern Jerusalem.

"We lived pretty well without Arab Jerusalem before the Six Day War," said Susser, who was born and raised in South Africa and who settled in Israel in 1963.

"We didn't feel oppressed particularly. Israel was never dependent on its survival on the Arab quarters in Jerusalem."

In eastern Jerusalem, he elaborated, Israel should keep the Western Wall, the Jewish quarter and all the neighbourhoods built since the Six Day War, and give up the rest.

Susser said that Israel's identity as a Jewish state has been increasingly questioned by Israeli Arabs and by political and academic circles in and out of Israel.

Yet Jews have as much right to self-determination in their own land as anyone else. "We don't have to apologize for this."

Israel's unilateral pullout from southern Lebanon left the misleading impression in the Arab world that Israel is weak and demoralized, Susser said.

The Feb. 6 election in Israel sent out a resounding message that Israelis are more resilient than some Arabs imagine.

"Israel today, militarily and economically, is more powerful than ever before."

The booming high-tech industry has catapulted Israel into the 21st century, and its gross national product is greater than that of Egypt and Syria combined.

Urologist hopes to improve prostate cancer treatment

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Seventy percent of Dr. Laurence Klotz's patients are men.

Klotz, chief of urology at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre and a professor of surgery at the University of Toronto, is a specialist in urinary oncology. That means he deals primarily with cancers of the prostate, bladder, testicles, kidney and penis, diseases associated with males.

Academia

A U of T professor for the past 15 years, Klotz has no shortage of patients. Prostate cancer, one of the most common human internal malignancies, strikes one man in seven in the Western world.

Last year, 25,000 Canadians were diagnosed with prostate cancer. By all estimates, some 4,000 Canadians will succumb to it this year.

Klotz says the risk of prostate cancer increases with age. The disease is rarely seen in men under 40, but they become at risk when they reach their 60s and 70s.

A slow-growing malignancy, prostate cancer is more common and lethal among blacks than among Caucasians (including Jews) and Asians.

Its onset is also related to family history, diet and exposure to sunlight, said Klotz, whose recently published handbook, Prostate Cancer: A Guide for Patients (Prospero Books), is endorsed by the Prostate Cancer Research Foundation of Canada.

"If someone in your family has had prostate cancer, you have a higher risk of getting it," the doctor says.

And studies in laboratory animals have shown a relationship between fat intake and prostate cancer.

In addition, the prostate cancer rate is highest in northern climates, particularly Scandinavian countries, which have less sunlight.

If detected sufficiently early, the disease is highly curable. Treatment consists of radiation or surgery. Surgery, however, can affect sexual function, namely the ability to have an erection.

Klotz says half to two-thirds of men who submit to surgery become impotent.

"This is the most common long-term side effect of surgery for prostate cancer," he notes.

This type of surgery can be problematic because the tiny nerves regulating erections run very close to the prostate and are not easily visible.

As a result, they can inadvertently be severed in conventional prostate surgery.

Even when a surgeon performs what Klotz describes as a "nerve-sparing procedure," impotence may result.

Cognizant of this risk, Klotz, in association with an American company, helped develop a user-friendly device – the Caver Map – that better enables surgeons to avoid damaging those sensitive nerves connected with sexual function.

Dr. Laurence Klotz

Put succinctly, the Caver Map enables surgeons to map out the geography of a man's nerves.

Klotz, who has no financial interest in the Caver Map, has made use of it in some 80 operations in the past three years, but only in cases of early, low-grade prostate cancer.

With the Caver Map, 75 percent of patients can be sexually active following surgery. Yet the Caver Map is hardly perfect. Sexual function is often not going to be as good as it was prior to the operation, he warns.

Klotz notes the Caver Map "does not have to be used."

Since the benefits of the Caver Map are still debatable, Sunnybrook is the sole Canadian hospital using it. "There are significant barriers in introducing new technology in Canada," he observes.

By contrast, 100 hospitals in the United States use the Caver Map, which was highlighted in a recent edition of the Journal of Urology.

Patients willing to try the Caver Map should be aware that Sunnybrook charges a $1,200 fee for its disposal components.

Klotz, a tall, athletic-looking man who frequently cycles to work, even in winter, was born in Toronto.

The son of Philip and Jenny Klotz, he graduated from York Mills Collegiate and U of T.

"I come from a long medical tradition," he says. "My father is a urologist. My maternal grandfather, Aaron Volpe, was a doctor. His son, Bob, was chief of medicine at Wellesley Hospital."

Klotz, whose mother is a marriage and family therapist, is active in research.

He has delved into such areas as the regulation of the cell cycle and cell senescence in prostate cancer.

Eight years ago, he founded The Canadian Journal of Urology, of which he is editor-in-chief.

Published six times a year, with a circulation of 3,000, it is the only periodical of its kind on Canada.

The Canadian Journal of Urology was recently indexed by the National Library of Medicine. Klotz considers it a signal honour, as only journals with a substantial impact are listed.

He and his wife, Robin, a psychotherapist and writer, have two children, Alex and Betsy, and belong to Holy Blossom Temple.

OMISSION

In the article, "Support essential when dealing with cancer" (CJN, Feb. 15), it was not mentioned that the event, held at Holy Blossom Temple, was co-sponsored by the Holy Blossom Sisterhood and the Toronto Jewish Healing Project. We regret the omission.

A HISTORY IN WORDS AND PICTURES

In Remembrance There is Hope

The Holocaust Chronicle is a remembrance designed to be held in one's hands. It is a portable archive that demands to be looked at and read. Although its weight and heft cannot capture the immensity of its subject, the volume's size does suggest that this is a topic that must be openly confronted.

Includes 2,000 photographs, a 3,000-item timeline, and 250 sidebars detailing the significant people, places, issues, and events. Written and fact-checked by top scholars. Hard cover, 768 pages.

JWI takes steps to end domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The annual Walk for Hope, sponsored by Jewish Women International of Canada will be held this year on March 25.

The walk, held to raise funds for JWI's domestic violence programs and to raise awareness of the issue, began two years ago in Montreal.

Last year, walks took place at the same time in Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, and this year members in Vancouver are also taking part.

"Next year, we're hoping to have simultaneous walks throughout North America," said Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI/Canada.

"We need money to keep our projects going, but we also need to keep this issue in the public's eye. People need to know domestic violence is ongoing," she said.

JWI's projects include a rabbi's guide to domestic violence which alerts rabbis to the signs of physical, psychological, financial and sexual abuse, and a new guide for community workers.

"There are many insidious forms of abuse. If community workers do not ask the right questions, they might not discover that they are dealing with an abused woman," said Krowitz.

The organization also distributes a pamphlet titled Protect Yourself, which offers concrete advice for any women who is planning on leaving an abusive situation.

"Very often, women are so powerless they don't understand what they can do to help themselves. Connecting them to a social service agency is the first step," she said.

Together with Jewish Family and Child Service, JWI runs ASTEH — Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing— a kosher apartment for women who have fled their home and have nowhere else to go.

"We've been asked why we only have one apartment and the reality is that there is many degrees of abuse.

"Some abused women do not need to leave their home; they need strategies to deal with their situation. Others have a place to stay or money to set up their own home. Not every woman needs to run away," said Krowitz.

If someone presents themselves while the apartment is being used, Krowitz said alternative arrangements are made. "We are making some plans to provide some additional housing."

Upkeep of the apartment includes replacing the furniture and broadloom when necessary, restocking the fridge and cupboards with kosher food when a new family moves in, and cleaning the apartment.

Volunteers, who are screened and go through a training program, often babysit, offer a "completely non-judgmental ear" when a woman needs to talk, and act as friends.

"It is a huge decision to leave the family home and women who have ranged in age from 20s to 70s, often feel frightened, alone and demoralized. The volunteers work hard and care deeply about the them," said Krowitz.

The residents of the apartment, who are obligated to be in counselling, have given social workers very positive feedback, she said. "Some say that living in a place in which no one knows where they are, has given them time to think without tension and stress."

ASTEH facilities are also in Montreal and Winnipeg. "Our dream is to have facilities across North America," said Krowitz.

The Toronto walk, chaired by Juliette Hershkovich, takes place from 9 to 11 a.m. at Fairview Mall, and registration is at 8:30 a.m. Corporate sponsors have donated money to the walk and walkers are raising money through individual sponsors. Sponsorships of $25 or more are eligible for gifts.

For information call JWI at 630-9313.

York U to offer grad diplomas in Jewish studies

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University students will soon be able to pursue graduate diplomas in Jewish studies.

Applications are currently being taken for September admissions to two different types of graduate diplomas, said Prof. Michael Brown, director of the centre for Jewish studies at York University.

"One degree is a free-standing diploma for those interested in Jewish studies, and the other is to be taken in conjunction with a graduate program."

"I believe," Brown said, "that this is the first formal program in Jewish studies in the province of Ontario on the graduate level."

For those students enrolled in a graduate program at York, the diploma can be earned at the same time they pursue their master's or doctoral degrees. While students work on the methodologies of the particular discipline they're interested in, they will also be pursuing work in Jewish studies, said Prof. Sara Horowitz, associate director of the centre.

The "crowning ornament" of the graduate diploma is a seminar which will be given through the faculty of graduate studies by the centre, said John Lennox, dean of the faculty of graduate studies.

Established in 1989, the centre for Jewish studies now has over 60 affiliated faculty members. The seminar will draw from the expertise available at York, Lennox said.

"Our hope is to give students a sense of the development of Jewish studies as an interdisciplinary field," Horowitz said. "The seminar will give participants an opportunity to hear from all the different disciplines and see some of the interlinkings between them.

"The academic world is moving more and more towards understanding the importance of interdisciplinary connections.

"No longer do we think, for example, that if we're historians we don't do anything but history."

Michael Brown, Sara Horowitz and John Lennox.

While the boundaries that we make between history and culture and sociology and literature are necessary, they are also fuzzy, Horowitz explained.

"Who's to say whether a memoir of a Holocaust survivor falls into the domain of history, sociology or literature?

"The disciplinary boundaries are conveniences, but sometimes they also need to be walked across. The bridges need to be built."

"It's crucial for everyone in Jewish studies to have a strong interdisciplinary grounding," Brown added.

"Jewish studies is often a field where you get hired and you find yourself the only person with any training at all. It's important to know everything from the Bible to Buber and beyond."

"York University is very much attuned to interdisciplinarity," Horowitz said.

"We already have a number of graduate diplomas at York," Lennox said. "These two newest diplomas will be designed to be complements to students' interests."

Anti-Semitic incidents skyrocket in Quebec

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Anti-Semitic incidents in Montreal shot up 92 percent last year – from 37 in 1999 to 71 in 2000 – B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) League for Human Rights reported in its 19th annual audit.

The increase was due mainly to the Middle East intifadah and inroads made by white supremacists, according to the audit.

The figure for Quebec represented the most ever reported for the province since the audit began, and a 255 percent rise over the 20 incidents in 1998. The provincial figure also accounted for a little over one-quarter of all incidents nationwide.

BBC officials emphasized francophone Quebecers had little to do with the unprecedented level, despite "l'affaire Michaud," which B'nai Brith paid significant attention to in its audit, but did not include in its incident tally.

League Quebec chair Steve Slimovitch said the unanimous National Assembly motion condemning Michaud pointed to a "strong forward step" in the way Quebec society will not accept intolerance towards its ethnic minorities.

The audit noted most hate groups in Quebec are non-francophone, most hate graffiti was in English, and the local reaction that erupted last fall in response to the Middle East violence came from "much ill will" between Muslim, Arab and Jewish groups.

Many of the incidents, which peaked last October and November, took place in areas where Jews and Muslims study or live together, such as at Concordia University and in the multi-ethnic municipality of St. Laurent.

The incidents included anti-Semitic slurs at campus and city-wide rallies, numerous visual depictions of the Star of David equating it with the Nazi swastika, verbal and physical attacks against Jewish individuals – seven last October and November alone compared to none in 1999 – and vandalism and threats against Jewish institutions.

In one notorious incident, two individuals attacked a man wearing a kippah in a Metro station, knocked him unconscious, and tried to throw him onto the rails before passers-by rushed to his aid.

In another incident, a young man, wearing a kippah had his nose broken outside a St. Laurent metro station.

Two of the worst incidents of anti-Semitic graffiti, the audit says, appeared to involve neo-Nazi groups.

In one occurrence at the Twin Oaks High School in Fabreville, racist and anti-Semitic slurs were scrawled all over the building, which the report described as "one of the most violent expressions of hate ever recorded in Quebec in the 19 years of compiling this report."

In another incident, the base of the Victoria bridge was defaced with the words, "Kill those Jews. It's time for war again," and "Hitler forever."

These stood out because of the use of symbols and markings used only by organized racist groups, BBC-Quebec director Robert Libman said.

"This makes it less likely that the incidents were random acts perpetrated by a handful of youths with spray cans, as is often the case, but something more sophisticated and organized," he said.

One white supremacist group called Vinland Skinheads, and other groups of like mind have been rumoured "to have recently been organizing and attempting to recruit" in Quebec.

The audit devoted a separate section to the controversy surrounding Yves Michaud, who suggested Jews feel they're the only people to have suffered through history and singled out ethnic voting patterns in Cote St. Luc, a predominantly Jewish suburb, during the 1995 referendum.

B'nai Brith officials stressed repeatedly at a recent press conference that the organization never referred to Michaud as anti-Semitic.

B'nai Brith called Michaud a "dinosaur" and his remarks "insensitive but not squarely anti-Semitic," Libman said.

But in an interview with The CJN, Libman acknowledged, "On the surface, an interpretation of his statement can be that it has anti-Semitic overtones, or that it was said with malice towards the Jewish community, there's no question.

"But in and of itself, it's more difficult to say. We were very careful about [not] calling him anti-Semitic."

B'nai Brith received eight e-mail hate messages related to the Michaud affair, which it counted in the audit.

The Montreal tally of anti-Semitic incidents included 30 acts of vandalism, 24 of harassment, nine threats and eight assaults.

Other examples of specific local incidents cited in the audit included seven Jewish homes vandalized in Ste. Agathe with their mezuzot ripped off, a rabbi harassed and insulted on a Montreal bus by 10 to 15 youths and a number of swastika defacements on homes and in public areas.

Kosher supermarket bankrupt

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — What was billed as Canada's first all-kosher supermarket has closed, less than a year and a half after opening, and its owners have filed for bankruptcy.

Kosher World in Decarie Square opened with great fanfare in September 1999, promising kosher consumers the same convenience and professionalism other shoppers expect when filling their grocery orders.

Initially, Kosher World was operated by the shopping centre, which is owned by David Azrieli's Canpro Investments Ltd. One year ago, it was taken over by the Bineth family, owners of Montreal Kosher Bakery, which has been in business for some 50 years.

"I lost lots and lots of money," said Yaacov Bineth.

At 33,000 square feet, the store was just too big to be profitable, he said.

While the meat and bakery sections did reasonably well, packaged goods were not moving quickly enough.

All that space required filling the shelves with many different products, including a lot of imported items. They did not sell well, either because there was no demand or, especially in the case of popular national brands, they were being sold at lower prices at regular supermarkets, he said.

Produce was also a problem, Bineth said, noting he was competing directly with another fruit-and-vegetable store in Decarie Square.

Bineth said he was not able to compete with the big chains, which nearly all have kosher departments in areas where there is a Jewish population.

Customers, he said, were demanding "quality, service and [a low] price, and that's not possible." Bineth said he had to raise prices to meet expectations and he lost business as a result.

Bineth feels he was also hurt by the tendency of customers to come in only to buy the weekly advertised specials.

Being located on the second floor, with no street access, was another drawback, he said. That site has had a supermarket since the shopping centre opened in the late 1970s; prior to Kosher World, it was Joseph Anthony, a regular supermarket with an extensive kosher section, also operated by Decarie Square.

Bineth continues to own three Montreal Kosher Bakery retail outlets, including a new location in the Wilderton Shopping Centre, that is larger than the previous one.

Canpro vice-president Myer Bick said there are plans to reopen a food store, but he was not clear exactly what form it would take.

"Mr. Azrieli is committed to reopening as soon as possible. We are in negotiations with a number of people… Quite a few people are interested," Bick said last week.

"It may be all kosher. Definitely, it will continue to have a kosher motif."

Bick said he remains convinced that "one-stop shopping for the kosher consumer is a good idea. It's a great concept for the right operator."

That concept includes providing the kosher food shopper with the whole gamut of grocery needs under one roof, plus such features as car orders, home delivery and indoor parking.

"We believe the kosher consumer should enjoy the same quality control, variety, cleanliness and service as is found in other supermarkets," Bick said.

He would not comment on how Bineth ran the business.

Israeli artist's lost work found in Schindler's suitcase

By MARTIN ZEILIG
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Several original works of art by Israeli artist Joseph Bau, hidden for over 20 years in a suitcase in Germany are now, along with the suitcase, at Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial museum in Jerusalem.

The story, which has a Canadian connection, has only recently been made public.

Joseph Bau's daughters, Hadasa Bau Rosenblatt and Clila Bau Cohen, first heard about the suitcase when a German newspaper reporter, Claudia Keller, left a message in English on their father's answering machine in his studio in Tel Aviv last February.

Joseph Bau, 1962, Lino-cut on paper. Courtesy of the Yad Vashem Art Museum, The Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, Jerusalem, Israel.

"She said, 'You need to know there are seven beautiful paintings in the suitcase, and one is of a violin player and another is of a peace dove,'" recalled Bau Rosenblatt, who lives in Winnipeg with her husband, a local high school teacher, several months each year.

The suitcase, which was given to Yad Vashem a year ago by the family that found it, belonged to German industrialist Oskar Schindler, whose story was immortalized in director Steven Spielberg's 1993 movie, Schindler's List, and in an earlier book of the same name by Australian author Thomas Keneally. Schindler died in poverty in Germany in 1974 at age 66.

Mr. Bau, now 80 and in poor health, was one of some 1,200 Jews who survived the last months of World War II in relative safety at Schindler's factory in Brinnlitz, in the former Czechoslovakia. An exhibit of over 20 of his drawings and paintings, which were the subject of an article in the Globe and Mail last August, were on display at the Jewish Heritage Centre at the Asper Jewish Community Campus for three months last spring and summer, and later at the Calgary Jewish Centre.

How the suitcase came to be found reads like a plot from a spy story.

Stored in the attic of a home in Hildesheim, Germany, for over 20 years, the suitcase was re-discovered three years ago after the death of the home's owner, Dr. Heine Staehr.

David Crowe, a history professor at Elon College in Greensboro, North Carolina, who has examined the suitcase's contents and is currently writing a biography of Oskar Schindler, notes that Dr. Staehr's wife, Ami, who died in 1988, was Oskar Schindler's last lover.

"After he [Dr. Staehr] died, his kids were going to give up the apartment and the two sons and a daughter-in-law went to clean out the personal stuff and in the attic they found a huge wooden box and inside it was a grey Samonsite suitcase," he explained during a recent telephone interview.

"It said 'O. Schindler.' So they took it home and left it there for a few months and then went through it."

Later, one of the brothers who had befriended Keller some years before, loaned her the suitcase and its contents. When Keller received a telephone call from Staehr asking her if she wanted "to have a look" inside the suitcase, she jumped at the opportunity.

In October 1999, Keller and fellow journalist Stefan Braun wrote a series of articles on Schindler and the suitcase for the Stuttgarter Zeitung.

"Schindler would come and stay there [in the Staehr house] for three or four weeks. One day Schindler came with his suitcase and asked her [Ami Staehr] to take care of it," commented Keller, who now works for the Berlin daily newspaper, Tagesspiegel.

Besides Bau's paintings, she also found correspondence between Schindler and many of the Jews he had saved.

Keller, who noted that there were also some personal, or "love," letters between Schindler and Ami Staehr in the suitcase, said, "It was so amazing to have these letters in my hand."

After sifting through the material, she called Joseph Bau and other Schindler Jews to, as Keller mused, find out "what it was like" to be one of those fortunate few on his famous list.

"My father gave the paintings to Oskar Schindler more than 30 years ago as a gift because he knew how much he [Schindler] loved his work," Bau Rosenblatt said.

"He always called my father 'my little son.' Whenever Schindler came to Israel, he was always at the opening of my father's art exhibitions."

Bau Rosenblatt added that some of her father's original art work from the war, which was exhibited in Krakow, Poland in 1945, was taken to the U.S. by an unscrupulous dealer and has never been seen since.

Joseph Bau's work can be viewed on the Internet at www.josephbau.com.

Were You Forced To Work For The Nazis?

Jewish Holocaust Survivors May Be Entitled To Ccmpensation From A New Fund

Individuals who performed slave or forced labor under the Nazi regime may be eligible for payment from the Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future." In accordance with the German legislation, eligibility for "slave labor" and "forced labor" is as follows:

- Slave Labor – work performed by force in a concentration camp (as defined in the German Indemnification Law) or a ghetto or another place of confinement under comparable conditions of hardship.

- Forced Labor – work performed by force (other than "Slave Labor") in the territory of the German Reich or in a German-occupied area, and outside the territory of Austria, under conditions resembling imprisonment or extremely harsh living conditions; or work performed by force under a program implementing the National Socialist policy of "extermination through work" (Vernichtung durch Arbeit) outside the territory of Austria.

The Claims Conference is administering this program for the benefit of Jewish Holocaust survivors in this country. Heirs of laborers who died on or after February 16, 1999 may be eligible for this fund.

The deadline is August 11, 2001. If you think you may be eligible, please obtain an application form by calling:

Facts should not be a nuisance

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

In this column we really try to give politicians the benefit of the doubt. Admittedly, they sometimes make it very difficult, but whenever possible, we take the high road. It is therefore frustrating that we cannot salvage even a word of praise for the recent antics of some of our federal party leaders.

Stockwell Day held a media session the other day which was so astonishing, print media across the country published the transcript of the exchanges between Day and some of the journalists. The media conference was held in the immediate aftermath (we're talking hours) of revelations concerning a $70,000 political contribution to the Canadian Alliance from the Alberta law firm that represented Day in the now infamous libel suit.

Day refused to respond to media inquiries regarding the contribution because "he had already addressed that issue with the media on the previous Saturday." The reporters were incredulous: How could Day claim to have answered questions about an issue that had not yet even surfaced? Once Day was caught in that particular "spin cycle" he doggedly continued to repeat the refrain until in exasperation, the journalists moved onto another issue.

Now onto Progressive Conservative leader Joe Clark who has exhibited a similar determination to expose the prime minister as a dastardly influence-peddler. This, despite an RCMP announcement that they have no basis to initiate an investigation into the matter and no evidence of prime ministerial wrong-doing. Incredibly, at the same time as Clark stated that he "accepted the conclusions of the RCMP report" he rose in the House to charge that the report was neither conclusive nor complete.

How can we hold the government accountable if the two opposition parties on the right are led by individuals for whom facts are little more than a nuisance to side-step in their efforts to advance their particular agendas? Quite apart from the concerns it raises regarding the notion of leadership, the leaders' respective stubbornness makes for very poor strategic thinking.

We can only hope that with the recruitment of Ezra Levant as Day's spinmeister, the leader of the official Opposition will swing back-on-track. As for Clark, while he scurries around looking for new evidence to use against Chretien, he unwittingly has provided all of us with fresh evidence of his own failings. Just one more reason for him to put us out of our misery by calling it a (d)Day.

יחיה קשה, קשה מאוד

ניפוץ האשליות של מחנה השלום הוא חוויה קשה במיוחד. מיליוני ישראלים האמינו שאפשר למצוא פתרון לשלום כולל, ושפשרה אמיצה עדיפה על מלחמה מתמשכת. אבל לשלום צריך פרטנר, ובראפת אינו פרטנר. ברק הציע לו את כל הגדה ואת ירושלים המזרחית, אבל בראפת פתאום נזכר שהוא שכח דבר קטן- להחזיר ארבעה מליון פליטים ערביים. קרוב לוודאי שאם ברק היה מציע לו להחזיר את ארבעה מליון הפליטים, ערפאת היה דורש שיחזירו ארצות ערב יחזרו לארצותיהם. במשך חודשים חיח ברור כשמש שהצעות ברק הן קצה היכולת הישראלית, ושאם יפול ברק תיפולנה גם ההצעות שלו. ערפאת, כאילו לא קרח דבר, דורש עכשיו להמשיך את השיחות מהמקום שהן הפסיקו. שמחתי לשמוע שגם ברק וגם חנשיא בוש הודיעו שאין שרון או ארצות הברית מחויבות לחצעות שערפאת סירב לחן. חולך להיות קשה, קשה מאוד. חטרור בתוך שטח ישראל יגבר קרוב לוודאי ואיתו ירידה באיכות חחיים הישראלית. צריך לקוות ששרון, ברק ופרס יעבדו בשיתוף פעולה, בקולגיאליות ובלי סכינים בגב. סכינים יש מספיק מהטרור הערבי. אבל שישאר ביניהם.

חָבֵר שמחת תרם חשבוע את חקטע חבא:

הצדיע השוטר ואמר לשמולק: "סע לשלום."

קיום לדמותו

כמו רבים אחרים, אני מנסח לתחות על קנקנו של שרון דרך אלפי המילים והראיונות איתו בעיתון. היה שם דווקא קטע שהפתיע אותי לטובה: נחום ברנע ושמעון שיפר שאלו אותו אם הוא מתכוון כמו כל קודמיו לחחליף את אנשי השגרירות בעולם שמוט על ידי ברק. ענח שרון: אין מה למהר, תאנשים תאלח העבירו משפחות, והילדים שלהם נקלטו בבתי ספר אחרי קשיים רבים, או צריך להתחשב. צריך לקוות שזה סימן לבאות.

שעת נפש

חצות וחצי. כמו רבים מיכם חזרתי לא מזמן מחופעתו המחשמלת של דיויד ברווה. שום דבר לא נוגע יותר עמוק משירים. אולי רק ריחות. אתה חולך ברחוב ופתאום מריח בושם שאימך חשתמשה בו לפני ארבעים שנח, ובבת אחת אתה במקום אחר, בזמן אחר. כך גם שירים. אני חושב לעצמי כמה ששירו "יחיה טוב" מסכם את כל חמצוקה והעצב של לחיות בישראל. חשיר חזה, על פי דרכו, חפך להיות החמנון חישראלי חבלחי רשמי.

ילדים פרשים כנפיים
וחולכים אל חצבא,
וכעבור שנתיים
חם חוזרים ללא תשובה.

אבל בסוף, למרות חמצב חקודר, עולה אותה אופטימיות אינסופית שנותנת לעם חזה להתקיים בניגוד לכל חסיכויים:

יחיה טוב, יחיה טוב, כן
לפעמים אני נשבר,
אך חלילה, כן חלילה
איחגך אני נשאר.

חבקן חוק זה את זו. אל תקחו דברים כמובנים מאליהם. צלצלו לחברים. חגידו מילה טובה. ושיקיחה טוב.

Chicken soup - Jewish penicillin

BY GEORGE ERDOSH
Special to The CJN

My mother's chicken soup – a genuine central European Jewish version – was legendary. Clear as fresh-brewed tea, it was honey coloured with mouth-watering, coin-sized, pale gold rounds of chicken fat drifting on the surface around the contrasting coarsely chopped green Italian parsley flakes.

In the liquid, strands of vermicelli, polka-dots of green peas and orange carrot rings (cooked separately to remain crisp and bright) lent body and a firm toothsome texture.

The flavour was bright, deep, and almost clucked, it was so full of the taste of chicken.

My friends claimed that their mothers' chicken soup was better, but when I had the occasion to test, I didn't think so. Every Jewish mother who knows how to use her kitchen range claims she has the best chicken soup, based on a recipe passed down through generations.

Small variations in ingredients, method of preparation and finishing touches make enough difference in the final result that the highly sensitive taste buds of a growing child can detect and retain the flavour memory of a chicken soup forever.

This is particularly true of the flavour of matzah balls! In many Jewish kitchens today, the cook reaches for the box of matzah ball mix – each time with a small dab of guilt – and the result is uniformly the same.

When I became a food professional, I tested my mother's chicken soup recipe, retested and revised it to suit modern taste buds and dietary trends, particularly lowering the fat level. I may have even improved on the flavour with my food science wisdom. But what I definitely improved was the matzah ball.

My mother made excellent matzah balls. They were the size of a lime or a lemon, not too soft to be mushy and not so hard that they jumped across the table when you attempted to cut them, and they had just a touch of ginger to give them a tiny zing.

Yet I did improve my mother's matzah balls with some jazzy flavour, reducing them to a more manageable and eye-appealing walnut size, while improving on preparation method. Now here is a matzah ball that's worth passing down to the next generation – and with not much more effort than opening a box of mix.

But let's deal with the soup first.

CHICKEN SOUP, OR JEWISH PENICILLIN

A good, traditional Jewish chicken soup is a supreme first course to launch any festive meal. As luck has it, it is also highly nutritious and even has some therapeutic health benefits. A University of Nebraska Medical Centre team in 1993 indicated that there was a medical basis for chicken soup's mythical healing powers. Whether it is a single ingredient that is responsible or the combination of all the ingredients is still not known. But a traditionally prepared chicken soup inhibits the clumping of a certain type of white blood cells (called neutrophils) that cause congestion and inflammation in people suffering from the common cold.

To start the soup, recipes often call for a whole stewing hen. Yet you can produce just as good chicken soup from parts you have been accumulating in the freezer – bones, gizzards, wings, any chicken parts, including the skin and the feet. Liver is the only part you should reserve for other purposes because it adds too much flavour of its own to the soup.

The first step is to prepare a long-simmering stock on low heat with the chicken parts and the essential flavouring vegetables – carrots, onion, celery and parsnips (or parsley root) – and spices – salt, peppercorn, thyme, parsley (some recipes add a bay leaf and garlic). In the second step, you drain the stock, retaining nothing but the liquid. You discard the chicken meat too.

Many cooks reuse the chicken meat from the stock, but in a well-made soup, virtually all the flavour has passed into the liquid and the chicken is dry and flavourless.

If there is too much fat on top, there are a couple of easy ways to remove most, but not all of it. Fat contains the fat-soluble flavours that contribute to the overall taste of the soup as well as the glimmering golden globs that appeal to the eye.

If you have plenty of time, the easy way to remove fat is to chill the stock until the fat floating on top congeals. Then you scoop off as much as you wish. Retain at least a thin layer. If you have little time before serving, use a poultry baster to dig under the fat layer and pump the clear liquid below a basterful at a time, emptying it into a second pot until you have accumulated enough.

There is also an ingenious little defatting device, a decanter with a long spout designed to separate the fat on top while the long spout drains the fatless bottom portion. You can buy in kitchen stores if you are into gadgets.

Now that you have the crystal clear, partly-defatted stock, it is time to add some complementary colour and body, and of course, the matzah balls, and the soup is ready for the diners.

Vermicelli (broken into short pieces for easier spooning), freshly blanched crisp peas and carrot rings, and matzah balls were traditional at my mother's table, but you may serve whatever you feel is best. Keep colours in mind and add just a little so the uncluttered soup retains its clarity and brilliance. Never add the flavourless and mushy vegetables from the stock.

Garnish the top with flakes of coarse-chopped fresh parsley.

Matzah Balls

Cook the matzah balls separately, not in the soup because starch and congealed protein from the matzah balls will murk up your nice clear soup and ruin its appearance. You can cook them in plain salted water or a light chicken stock from chicken bouillon. You may prepare the matzah balls well in advance, ready to be reheated just before serving.

4 eggs
2 tbsp. vegetable oil or chicken fat
1 tsp. salt or to taste
1 tsp. ground black pepper, or to taste
1¼ tsp. freshly grated ginger
1 clove minced garlic
3 tbsp. fresh parsley, finely chopped
1 cup matzah meal
6 tbsp. water

Beat eggs lightly in a medium size bowl, mix in oil and seasonings. Add matzah meal and stir with a wooden spoon or rubber spatula until you have a uniform mix. Don't overwork dough. Adjust with water to have a medium stiff, easily workable dough. Refrigerate for 20 minutes.

Break dough into walnut-size pieces and roll each between your hands into balls.

Bring 4 cups of water to a boil in a medium pan. Add 1 tsp. salt and 2 chicken bouillon cubes or 2 tsp. chicken base powder. Gently drop in the matzah balls, bring back to boil and then reduce heat to simmer. Cover pan and cook balls gently for 10 minutes. Drain. Yields 14 to 18 matzah balls.

Chicken Soup

3 lb chicken parts: bones, wings, thighs, feet, gizzards, in any ratio
2 large carrots, washed, unpeeled, broken into coarse pieces
1 large onions, peeled, cut into quarters
2 celery stalks, cut into quarters
1 medium parsnip, washed, unpeeled, cut into three pieces (or parsley root)
6-8 sprigs fresh Italian parsley, whole
4 sprigs fresh thyme, whole or 2 tsp. dry thyme
1 tbsp. salt
¼ tsp whole black peppercorn
Matzah balls

Place all ingredients in a large stock pot and add water to cover. Bring water to boil over medium heat but watch the pot so water never comes to rolling boil (to avoid clouding the soup). When water is just about to boil, turn heat to lowest setting so only a few lazy bubbles break the surface. Cover pot and let simmer for 4 hours. (Longer simmering will not hurt soup.)

Remove pot from heat, scoop out most of the chicken parts and vegetables and discard. Strain the liquid through a fine strainer and defat soup if necessary (see defatting suggestions above). Adjust salt to your taste.

For soup body, cook vermicelli in salted water, blanch peas and carrots in boiling salted water until cooked but still crunchy. For garnish, coarsely chop fresh Italian parsley. Add small amount with matzah balls into individual soup bowls.

Hamantaschen are a favourite Purim treat

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Tradition tells us that the wicked Haman wore a tri-cornered hat. Each year on Purim we echo this form with the unique shape of hamantaschen. The word actually means Haman's pockets!

Regardless of the etymology, we know that hamantaschen are always thoroughly enjoyed around the world at Purim time. In my experience, they are the first items to be grabbed by big as well as little hands off the mishloach manot plates.

I would like to be able to assure you that your dough-to-filling ratio will come out exactly right while following these recipes. Unfortunately, as a firm believer in truth in recipes, I have to admit that it is a rare occurrence. So many factors are involved: the actual amount of flour mixed in; your expertise in rolling out, the humidity, the circumference of the glass, etc. If you have a bit of extra dough you can fill it with a bit of cinnamon-sugar mixture or jam, or even bake it as a plain cookie. Extra filling: either mix up more dough or freeze it for future use.

In addition to these fillings, try lekvar, jam, apple butter, as well as various nut-coconut mixtures. You can guess which the children will prefer!

HAMANTASCHEN DOUGH

4¼ cups unsifted all-purpose flour
3 tsp. baking powder
¾ cup sugar
grated rind of 1 lemon
¼ tsp. salt
4 beaten eggs
⅓ cup oil

Sift dry ingredients into a bowl. Make a well in dry ingredients and add eggs, one at a time. Stir in oil. Mix well and form into a ball. Knead lightly for a minute or two or until smooth. Chill to ease rolling out.

Preheat oven to 375. Roll out dough ⅛ in. thick. Cut into 3-inch rounds. Put a teaspoon of filling in the centre. Draw up two sides and then the third across. Pinch edges together to form a three-cornered pocket.

Bake on a greased or parchment-paper-lined cookie sheet until golden brown, about 20 minutes. Yield: about 4 dozen.

POPPY SEED FILLING

½ cup sugar
1 tbsp. honey
¼ cup water
1 cup ground poppy seed
2 tbps. lemon juice
1 tbsp. grated lemon peel
¼ cup golden raisins

Place sugar, honey and water in a small saucepan. Cook over medium heat for a few minutes until sugar dissolves. Add poppy seed to saucepan. Cook, stirring constantly, for one minute.

Remove from heat, stir in lemon juice, lemon peel and raisins. Chill for at least 2 hours. Mixture should not be liquid: add more poppy seed or fine cookie crumbs, if needed. Place a small ball of filling inside each circle. Bake as directed.

PRUNE FILLING

1 lb. prunes, pitted
3 thin orange slices
1 whole lemon, cut into quarters, seeded
½ cup sugar
1 tbsp. oil
½ tsp. cinnamon

Cook prunes and orange slices in a small amount of water until prunes are tender and water has evaporated.

Place lemon in bowl of food processor equipped with steel knife. Process for 10 seconds. Add remaining ingredients and fill dough. Bake as directed.

CHOCOLATE FILLING

2 tsp. unsalted margarine
¾ cup sugar
⅔ cup unsweetened cocoa powder
1 tsp. cinnamon

Melt margarine in a small saucepan over medium-high heat. Stir in sugar, cocoa and cinnamon, and cook, stirring, for 3 to 4 minutes. (Alternately, melt margarine on full power in microwave oven. Stir in sugar, cocoa and cinnamon.) Place ½ to ¾ tsp. in each hamantaschen and bake as directed.

French media portray Israel as 'criminal Eden'

By ANAT CYGIELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — A French television channel broadcast a program about Israel last week, called Israel – a criminal's paradise? The timing was not coincidental.

Last week, the trial in the Sentier affair began. In it, 124 traders from the Sentier textile district in Paris – most of them Jews of Tunisian descent – are charged with defrauding 33 banks and insurance companies of $77 million (US) in the late 1990s, using a "pyramid" scheme.

During the first day of the trial, the French prosecutor, François Franchy, alleged that Israel had assisted some of the suspects who fled to Israel following the first wave of arrests in 1997. Among those interviewed in the television program was Shmuel Flatto-Sharon, a former MK who was tried and convicted in Israel after confessing to defrauding a French company.

In the same context, the French media have repeatedly mentioned the inclusion of Israel, in June 2000, in an international blacklist of 15 countries that are not co-operating in the war against money-laundering. (Other countries on this list include Russia, Libya and Liechtenstein.)

The prosecutor in the Sentier affair claimed that, despite the fact that Israel is a signatory to an international extradition pact, it failed to live up to its commitment to hunt down the fugitives wanted in France in this case. By "intentionally" pursuing this policy, the prosecutor contended, "Israel removed itself from the family of nations."

According to the indictment, one of the main suspects in the case – Chaim Weizman, nicknamed Albert – fled to Israel with 150 million francs in cash. In an interview with Le Parisien from his Israeli hideout, Weizman said that the sum was much smaller.

The Justice Ministry vehemently denies that the Law of Return allows criminals to take refuge in Israel. Following the case of Samuel Sheinbein, a dual American-Israeli citizen who fled to Israel to escape murder charges in the United States, the Knesset amended the extradition law in order to prevent such incidents.

According to Justice Ministry spokesperson Ido Baum, Israel is one of the only countries in the world that extradites its citizens for trial abroad, but under one condition: If the extradited Israeli suspect is convicted, he will be allowed to serve his sentence in an Israeli prison. France, on the other hand, never extradites French citizens for trial in another country.

So, why didn't Israel extradite the seven suspects wanted by France in the Sentier affair? A number of these suspects are apparently Israelis of long standing, while others took out Israeli citizenship after fleeing France. According to Israel, it signed the European convention on extradition under the condition that evidence would be attached to extradition requests. Evidence was not included with the seven French extradition requests.

A year ago, a French delegation visited Israel and received instruction on how to submit a complete extradition request required by Israel. But the French failed to re-submit revised extradition requests, according to the director of the international department at the Justice Ministry, Irit Kahan. "Unfortunately, they have no one to blame but themselves," she says in response to the contentions of the French prosecutor.

The French look askance at this reply, which the Justice Ministry insists is not merely a formal excuse: "We could not approach the courts to ask for the arrest of the suspects based on the extradition requests submitted. They would not have stood the test of Israeli law."

Are the seven suspects really in Israel? As long as satisfactory extradition requests are not filed, Israel is not searching for them. Technically, it would not be difficult to track them down, sources say, unless they left Israel in the wake of the recent publicity.

The French claim that the seven suspects who took refuge in Israel are key members of the fraud scheme, but the trial is proceeding without them. It is not clear whether their absence will make things easier or more difficult for the other defendants.

"In principle, I think that Israel has caused itself damage by harbouring criminals on its soil," says William Goldnadel, a French-Jewish attorney representing one of the suspects in the case. "They are not good citizens and do not contribute to [Israel's] image," he argues.

Still, noting that France released the terrorist Abu Daoud and never complained to Syria about its harbouring a wanted French Nazi Alois Bruner, Goldnadel adds: "I think that the French prosecutor should display a bit more humility since we know how [France] behaved in regard to international co-operation in much more serious cases."

Who will succeed Arafat?

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Yasser Arafat recently underwent a series of medical examinations. Afterward, his Jordanian physician, Dr. Ashraf al-Kurdi, a neurologist, issued the following statement: "I have given 71-year-old Yasser Arafat a routine checkup, and there is nothing wrong with his medical condition; nor is there any basis for the rumours that he is ill or feeling unwell."

Al-Kurdi explained that he issued the statement after his clinic received phone calls all day from dozens of journalists inquiring about the Palestinian Authority (PA) chairman's health. Public interest in Arafat's physical health has increased significantly in recent months, and it appears that the current intifadah is behind this renewed interest.

The Arab and international media report widely on the outburst of violence in the territories and inside Israel, and these reports include keeping a close eye on Arafat. He is once again prominently featured in the world media, and journalists are looking closely at the effect on him of the dramatic change in the situation – the shift from the tranquillity of diplomatic negotiations to the tension of bloody clashes and exchanges of fire. Is Arafat hanging on?

A recent interview with peace rejectionist Farouk Kaddoumi, the only surviving member besides Arafat of the five co-founders of the Fatah movement in Kuwait in 1959, also touched on the issue.

"It is said that Arafat's health is not very good. Who will come in his place?" the interviewer asked.

Kaddoumi gave an evasive answer regarding the legal procedures involved in choosing a successor.

The question of who will succeed Arafat is a completely taboo subject among the Palestinian public and leadership. Arafat is the "leader and symbol of the nation," and symbols have no deputies and no successors.

The very fact that a discussion of Arafat's potential successors was published by the PA's official newspaper, Al-Hayat al-Jadida, is therefore significant. Naturally, the contents of this discussion are also important.

Breaking off talks with Israel appears to have greatly weakened Arafat. His position and stature, both locally and abroad, as the head of the Palestinian-state-to-be, are based on the Oslo accords. For many years (at least since the PLO effectively recognized the state of Israel in Algiers in 1988), Arafat has been moving toward a peace treaty with Israel, and he cannot turn the clock back now. It is therefore no coincidence that even in the midst of the current violence, he continues to declare his devotion to the process and negotiations with Israel.

The two men named as Arafat's possible successors – Abu Mazen (Mahmoud Abbas) and Abu Ala (Ahmed Qureia) – have also suffered a significant blow to their position. They are among the Palestinian leaders most afflicted with what is now called in the territories the "Oslo virus." Many in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank argue that they are the ones responsible for landing the Palestinians in the current situation.

In fact, the intifadah has undermined the position of all the members of Arafat's leadership circle. They are all accused of corruption and of the botched handling of affairs that led to the current deterioration.

Only two people, those surrounded by the military might of large security mechanisms, will manage to maintain their power when the situation in the territories deteriorates even further. They are Mohammed Dahlan, Gaza's strongman, and his counterpart in the West Bank, Jibril Rajoub. These two are likely to determine more than anyone else who will succeed Arafat.

The week in Israel

Feb. 19

• A commission of inquiry began hearing testimony in the killing of 13 Israeli Arabs by police during riots in October. The proceedings were suspended for more than an hour when relatives of one of the victims lunged at a border police guard giving testimony.

• Israel and the United States began joint military exercises in the Negev. The exercises had been scheduled months ago.

Feb. 20

• Egyptian and Israeli officials met in Tel Aviv to discuss a natural gas deal. The talks convened as scheduled despite denials last week by the Egyptian government that a deal had been struck.

• An air force helicopter rescued the 12-man crew of a Ukrainian freighter caught in rough seas during a storm off the coast of Ashdod.

Feb. 21

• Outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak reversed an earlier decision and decided not to serve as defence minister in the national unity government of Ariel Sharon.

Feb. 22

• Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon urged Diaspora Jews to "raise your voices" and "take every necessary step" to ensure Jerusalem remains united under Israeli sovereignty.

Feb. 23

• Talks between Likud and the Labour party on the formation of a coalition government will continue early next week as the two sides failed yesterday to reach a conclusive agreement on dividing the ministerial portfolios. The main stumbling blocks are Labour's demands for the Finance Ministry or the Education Ministry, in exchange for the Defence Ministry.

A tendency to latch onto negative

Sometimes it is the inadvertent media item unrelated to the Middle East that conveys the most informative message about how the Jewish community assesses media attitudes towards Israel.

According to Reports

For instance, in "Poof! You're a skeptic: The amazing Randi's vanishing humbug" (New York Times, Feb.17), James Randi, a world famous magician and debunker of claims for paranormal phenomena, notes the psychological human need to look for patterns.

This need, Randi says, helps explain why so many people hold irrational beliefs: "That's why psychics are so successful; 98 percent of their statements may be wrong, but people discount the mistakes and remember the hits. It's like panning for gold. If you find a gold nugget, that's what you seize upon. Never mind that you throw out pan after pan of sand and twigs."

Our own community is conditioned by our history of misfortune and hostility, as well as the hectoring sanctimony from key elements of the media, to react in a fashion that is the mirror image of what Randi describes. Instead of latching onto articles that are positive about Israel and confirm what we know to be true, many of us have a tendency to ignore them and focus instead on the negative item that is emotionally jarring, but confirms our deep-seated suspicions about hostility to Jews in general and Israel in particular.

Oddly, and yet not so strangely, this attitude seems to prevail at a time when major newspapers across the country, like the National Post and other Southam papers, but also the Globe and Mail, have published numerous fair-minded editorials, op-eds and columns.

Of course, this does not mean that many unfair and biased items are not also published. But it indicates that we as a community need to attune ourselves not only to what is positive but also to what is fair – including fair criticism – and to weigh what is negative in light of the positive reports that do appear.

Powell's visit portends change in policy

Indeed, Powell's trip to the Middle East – his first since becoming the top U.S. diplomat – appeared to be less about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict than getting Arab support for U.S. policies aimed at containing Iraq.

Powell's regional tour was slated to include a stop in Kuwait to attend celebrations marking the 10th anniversary of the end of the Persian Gulf War.

During meetings with Arab leaders last week, Powell discussed the need to keep sanctions against Iraq in place – first imposed in the wake of the war – in order to deal with the threat posed by Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

In fact, during a joint news conference with Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon on Sunday, Powell stressed that Saddam had to be restrained.

Citing German intelligence reports that Baghdad might have nuclear weapons in three years, Powell said, "We have to make sure that we do everything we can to contain" Saddam.

The difficulty of putting an end to Israeli-Palestinian violence was underscored by several incidents that took place during Powell's visit.

As Powell was urging the two sides to take steps to stop the cycle of violence, two Israeli settlers were wounded in separate shooting attacks in the West Bank. The commander of Israeli forces in the area said it is possible the two attacks were linked.

He noted that Powell's visit could have given Palestinian groups greater motivation to carry out such attacks.

After meeting Sunday in Ramallah with PA President Yasser Arafat, Powell called on Israel to lift the economic "siege" it had imposed on the areas under Palestinian control since violence erupted last September.

Later that day, Israel announced that it was taking a step aimed at implementing at least a part of Powell's requests: The Israeli army lifted roadblocks it had set up last week that had divided the Gaza Strip into two.

For his part, Arafat used his joint news conference with Powell to call on the United States to ensure that Israel pick up negotiations from where they left off under outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Barak's purported willingness to give the Palestinians control over parts of eastern Jerusalem during last July's failed Camp David summit led to the defections of several coalition partners and was a major factor in his defeat in the nation's Feb. 6 elections for prime minister.

Barak has said the proposals aired at Camp David were no longer on the table. Former U.S. president Bill Clinton has affirmed Barak's statement.

But Arafat maintained Sunday that "no government can write off what the previous government did."

Earlier in the day, after meeting with Powell, Sharon stipulated three conditions before Israel eases the economic sanctions on the PA: that Arafat makes a public statement to the Palestinians in Arabic calling for the discontinuation of all violence; that the PA resumes actions to stop incitement to violence; and that security co-ordination in the field be renewed.

If these conditions are met, goods and raw materials will be allowed across the border, and later a monitored entry of Palestinian workers into Israel will be made possible, Sharon said.

He suggested that workers first be allowed into Israel and the encirclement be lifted in areas where violence subsides. This would serve as an incentive for local leadership to promote the calm, he explained.

Alluding to the Palestinian allegations that Israeli economic sanctions amounted to collective punishment, Sharon stressed he was against any such form of punishment. He told Powell that once the violence subsides, the goal should be a non-belligenrency agreement. All the hurdles cannot be overcome at once, he said, which is why interim agreements were the only way to go.

"One thing should be clear: Israel will not negotiate under pressure of terror and violence," Sharon said at his joint news conference with the U.S. secretary of state.

Sharon denied that any negotiations were under way with the Palestinians. But he acknowledged that there existed "channels of communication" for conveying messages to them.

More than 2,000 Palestinians protested in Gaza against Powell's visit on Sunday, burning pictures of him and calling on him to go home.

Throughout the West Bank, Palestinian shopkeepers heeded demands by militant groups to protest Powell's visit and closed their shops early.

Meanwhile, a Jewish settler sustained serious head wounds following a shooting attack near Ramallah as Powell was holding talks with Arafat in the West Bank city. In that incident, Palestinian gunmen opened fire from a passing car, hitting the Israeli's car with dozens of bullets.

A short time later, an Israeli woman was lightly wounded in the hand and legs when shots were fired at the car she was traveling in near the settlement of Ofra.

Based on the proximity of the two attacks and the type of weapons apparently used, it was possible the two attacks were linked, the Israeli army said.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 18 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 8 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Tuesday, March 20, 2001 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, 100 Elder St. (Overbrook/Wilmington). It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:30 p.m. This year Ines DiSanto of Chez Moi will be presenting her 2001 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

George W. Bush brings new approach to conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

It has not taken long for President George W. Bush to map out the parameters of his Middle East policy and to appoint a Mideast affairs team.

In short order, the Bush administration has abandoned Bill Clinton's far-reaching peace proposals, rejected his hands-on diplomatic method and adopted a broader regional approach.

By way of ushering in these modifications, Colin Powell, the secretary of state, accepted the resignation of Dennis Ross, the United States' troubleshooter in the Mideast, and appointed a task force to grapple with its endemic problems.

Mideast Analysis

William Burns will replace Edward Walker as head of the State Department's Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs. Richard Armitage and Marc Grossman will be deputy secretary of state and undersecretary of state, respectively. Richard Haas has been named director of policy planning. All four are seasoned hands who have dealt extensively with Israel and the Arab world.

The most important change is that Washington no longer considers itself bound by Clinton's bridging proposals. Unveiled in an 11th-hour attempt to break the deadlock in Israel's negotiations with the Palestinian Authority, the proposals turned on core territorial and security issues, sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees.

Ariel Sharon, Israel's prime minister-elect, is pleased with Washington's new orientation. Having opposed the comprehensive package of compromises offered by Ehud Barak, the caretaker prime minister, he wants to concentrate on interim arrangements. The Palestinians, however, are demanding that future discussions begin at the point they left off at the Taba talks in January.

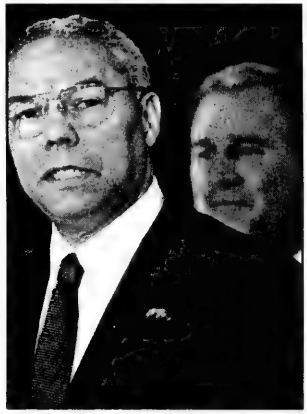
Powell and Condoleeza Rice, Bush's national security advisor, have made it abundantly clear that the United States will not be as intimately involved in Arab-Israeli diplomacy as the previous administration. They maintain that Israel and the Palestinians should take more responsibility for future negotiations.

In line with this thinking, Bush refrained from sending a special envoy to Taba, where no breakthrough was achieved, and remained studiously neutral during Israel's election campaign. Clinton, on the other hand, referred positively to Barak in an Israeli TV interview.

Bush and his advisors reportedly believe that Clinton and his two secretaries of state, Warren Christopher and Madeleine Albright, were too hasty to reach a deal, and that they failed to build an Arab consensus for an agreement.

These assumptions are not only debatable, but bypass the possibility that the U.S. will be drawn into the maelstrom of the Arab-Israeli conflict if, as expected, Israel's problematic relations with the Palestinians continue to deteriorate.

In any case, Powell's trip to the Middle East last week, his first as secretary of state, underscored its importance to American strategic interests. By paying visits to Israel, the Palestinian autonomous areas, Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, he let it be known that Israel is an integral U.S. ally and that the Mideast is on the front burner of American priorities.



Colin Powell and George W. Bush

Powell, though, has talked of shifting gears and creating a tighter link between the Arab-Israeli dispute and U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf. In this respect, Powell will doubtless focus a good part of his attention on Iraq and Iran, both of which the U.S. regards as "rogue states."

The challenges facing the Bush administration in the Persian Gulf are indeed formidable.

On Feb. 16, U.S. and British aircraft bombed Iraqi radar and air defence sites near Baghdad. Was this the opening shot of a concerted allied campaign to vigorously enforce the northern and southern no-fly zones in Iraq? Can the U.S. persuade the United Nations to tighten economic sanctions against Iraq in the face of opposition from countries like Russia, France, China and Egypt? Can the U.S. persuade Saddam Hussein to accept a new arms inspection regime? Is the U.S. willing to lift sanctions against Iran when they expire in the summer?

These questions will test the resolve and resiliency of American foreign policy in the Middle East.

Say L'chaim to new choice in retirement living

An environment that encourages residents to maintain an active lifestyle

A new, wonderfully small alternative has emerged in Jewish retirement living — right "on campus", so to speak, on Sheppard just west of Bathurst.

L'Chaim Retirement Home promises to allow the more independent older members of your family to enjoy a true "golden age": — a time when they will continue to savour new experiences and friendships, yet know that their needs will be attended to.

Judy Cohen, the founder of L'Chaim, was motivated by highly personal concerns. "Since the passing of my father in 1990, it has been my dream to establish a home for the elderly .... My father lived in a retirement home for seven years. I spent much of my time with him, and we discussed what would have made him feel happy and secure. L'Chaim fulfils my father's wishes and my dreams."

Opening soon on Sheppard, near Bathurst

L'Chaim is the fruition not only of Judy's labours, but also of others with considerable expertise in the retirement field. Drawing on the advice of social service professionals in North America and Israel, Judy has combined their input with the fruits of her own personal experience. Notable among this group is Lorraine Sherkin, well-known in Toronto for her commitment to, and caring for, the city's elderly. In her 30 years at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Lorraine's involvement in administration, admissions, activations, and volunteer work made her a loyal advocate of, and friend to, hundreds of residents.

Team includes Lorraine Sherkin

Lorraine will be an active member of the L'Chaim team. She'll help seniors examine their options and adjust, support families through the process, and share her enthusiasm and expertise with all.

The architect for the building is Kelman Associates, a leading architectural firm with many retirement and nursing homes to its credit. Its mandate: to incorporate the best features of previous projects in a uniquely different environment.

L'Chaim has been built "from the inside out": that is, interiors and furniture designs take into account the changes in functional capacity which accompany aging. Design based on this standard will enhance an individual's life, and make it possible to "age in place". It's an ideal home for retirees who enjoy their independence now, yet want to be prepared for future changes.

At L'Chaim, privacy will be respected, and every resident treated as an individual. And because adapting to retirement isn't always easy, L'Chaim offers counselling during the adjustment period.

L'Chaim is small and home-like, on a human scale, with 30 single rooms. Each has a private bathroom, shower, air conditioning and heating controls. Wheelchair-accessible rooms are also available. A major weekly cleaning and linen change will be offered. There's a laundry room on every floor for residents who wish to do their own washing and drying.

Staff will be on duty 24 hours a day; a physician will always be on call; and there will be 24-hour security, with an emergency call system. Medication will be administered under supervision, and a doctor will visit each resident on a regular basis.

Residents will be encouraged to lead active social lives. Jewish cuisine is featured; three haymishe meals — enjoyed communally, to promote fellowship — will be served daily in the spacious, well-lit dining room. There's afternoon tea, too, and Shabbos dinner on Friday.

The well-stocked library will be a boon to those who want to catch up on the reading they put off during a busy working life. There's personal mail delivery, e-mail and internet access; clearly, surfing the web knows no age boundaries! Cable TV and private phones are also available.

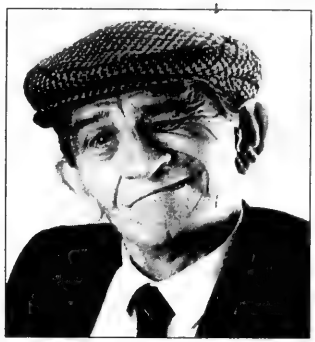
There are two lounges, a TV room, and an outdoor sitting area, as well as visitor parking. And L'Chaim is within walking distance of banking, a public library and shopping.

State-of-the-art safety features

On site and outdoors, L'Chaim will offer many organized recreational activities, including fitness classes, musical entertainment, bingo, card games, weekly movies, special outings, and crafts. Jewish cultural programs will include Hebrew and Bible study. Holy days will be observed.

L'Chaim welcomes retirees' families. Besides a play area, with toys, for grand- and great-grandchildren, there's a facility for private family functions. Many special family events will be included on the social program.

L'Chaim is a healthful, environmentally friendly, non-smoking home, where safety is paramount. To reduce the risk of falls, there are safety grab bars; and the halls have both hand rails and special non-slip flooring. Sprinkler, smoke and carbon monoxide detectors are in place.



Can retirement actually be fun? L'Chaim says "Yes!"

L'Chaim has spared no expense in building in living comfort. For example, space-age acoustic features have been included for those who are sensitive to loud noises. And of course, the different levels are connected by an elevator.

L'Chaim is a member of the Ontario Residential Care Association, and plans to open in summer 2001. For further information, call Judy Cohen at 416-398-7898, or e-mail her at info@lchaimretirement.com.

Having lived the experience of an aging parent first-hand and used it as her inspiration for L'Chaim, Judy is well-positioned to help your parents continue to live life to its fullest in a friendly new environment.

Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship established at the School of Business, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem

Israel Asper exemplifies excellence.

Israel Asper deserves credit for his vision of the future. His achievements in the business community have become legendary and with the establishment of the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship, he has provided a way for education to be integrated with the business community. This is another example of his entrepreneurial flair.

Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) is very excited to announce the establishment of the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Jonathan Kornbluth, Dean of the School of Business at Hebrew U puts it this way.

"The Asper Center is intended to be the focal point of entrepreneurship. The activities of the Business School will include: research, undergraduate and post graduate MBA teaching, and outreach programs for the benefit of the Israeli economy in general and the economy and development of Jerusalem in particular."

As an entrepreneur, Israel Asper's most notable achievement is the creation and development of CanWest Global Communications Corp. from a single television station in Winnipeg to an international communications company.

Asper is known as a dedicated philanthropist. "I believe that those who succeed should contribute back to their community through volunteerism, leadership and financial support," says Asper.

In keeping with his philanthropic beliefs, he established The Asper Foundation and the CanWest Global Foundation, both of which have undertaken major initiatives in culture, education, community development and human rights. In 1999 he received an Honorary Doctorate from The Hebrew University of Jerusalem to recognize his commitment to the Jewish and general communities in Canada and Israel, his leadership in the global communications industry and his outstanding support of Hebrew U.

In the last year, the Faculty of Business at the University of Manitoba has been named the I. H. Asper School of Business, which houses the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship. This new Centre contributes to the academic program of the University with its many exciting projects for current and potential business students, such as scholarships, a Biz Camp for 15-19 year olds, a Venture Capital Fund for student entrepreneurs, a lecture series featuring visiting CEO's from Fortune 500 companies, to name a few. This successful program is the model for the new Asper Centre in Jerusalem.

"We are very excited about the courses the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship will support," says Kornbluth. "For example, the Business Entrepreneurship course will bring groups of students together to work on business plans for new economic and service ventures. Our Internet Entrepreneurship program will combine students from the Business School and the Department of Computer Science to work on ideas for Internet start-up companies. And the newest program will be designed to enhance the viability of Bio-Tech Start-ups from the Hebrew U scientific community."

Asper is particularly interested in the outreach aspects of the program. Asper explained, "The Centre will support outreach programs to start-up companies in Israel, and community programs for special segments such as youth and women. The Young Entrepreneurs course will bring school children and university students together to develop new ideas, produce products, work out business plans and actually sell their products. The Biz Camp will expose Israeli children – Jewish and Arab - to entrepreneurship and business. The goal is to build self-confidence and an appreciation for the importance of continuing education."

CFHU will be honouring Israel Asper on Monday, June 18, 2001 with a Gala Tribute Dinner in Toronto for his outstanding commitment to Hebrew U and for establishing the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship.

"Israel Asper is a leader in the Jewish community in Canada and CFHU hopes that this dinner will give many of us a chance to meet the real Izzy. I have assumed responsibility to spearhead CFHU's campaign for the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship and am very excited about this challenge. The Centre will create the environment to develop the business leaders of tomorrow and will be the basis for building a stronger and more diversified Israel," says Dinner Chair, Ronald Appleby.

"The Hebrew University has always been a priority for me. This project is about securing the future by providing the best tools and resources for the education of our youth," says Asper. CFHU congratulates him for his exceptional leadership and vision. For more information about the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship or about the Asper Tribute Dinner, please call 1-888-HEBREWU or 416-485-8000.

Women more likely to suffer from depression: psychiatrist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At any age, women are twice as likely as men to suffer from depression and anxiety, says a staff psychiatrist at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health.

"This statistic is not only relevant in Ontario, but all over the world," said Dr. Mary Seeman, who spoke at the recent Toronto Hadassah-WIZO Women for Women breakfast.

Among adults, married women are the most likely to suffer depression, followed by single men, single women, and then married men who are the least likely to be affected, said Seeman, also professor emeritus at University of Toronto.

While there is no answer as to why married women are most susceptible, hormones do play a role in such conditions as post-partum depression.

"Depression is also a genetic disease – it runs in families," Seeman notes.

"An even greater determinant of depression, however, is the multiple roles played by married women. About 50 percent of women suffer at least one episode of depression in their lifetime, and that is even higher for mothers and grandmothers.

"Women are nurturers. They look after their children, their spouses, their friends and their parents, and they sometimes succumb to compassion. That is the burden for being a caring person. The women get their [emotional rewards], and they often have support systems, but they carry an incredible load."

Women are less likely than men to "drown their sorrows" in drinks or drugs, she said.

"Some men who are labelled alcoholics may really be masking their depression by drinking," she said. "Statistics, therefore, do not show them as depressed. Jewish men, who drink less than average, do have a higher incidence of depression."

Patients diagnosed with depression have had, for at least two weeks, a feeling of sadness or lack of pleasure, and several other symptoms include loss of drive, low self-esteem, a lot of aches and pains, insomnia, or suicidal thoughts, Seeman said.

These symptoms often interfere with a person's ability to function at work, with their relationships, and with their leisure time.

The best route for dealing with depression, Seeman explained, is through a family doctor.

"Many symptoms of depression appear as medical problems, such as fatigue or pains. Physical conditions should be ruled out before being treated for depression."

While various professionals treat depression there are common ingredients in all forms of therapy.

"Psychotherapy is the first line of treatment, but all therapy should offer hope and promote self-worth, and [the therapist] should concentrate on forming an alliance with the patient.

"There should also be an exchange of information, which is conducted [in language the patient can understand], not in medical jargon," Seeman said.

Anti-depressants, which are becoming quite popular, are effective for most people, she said, but they can have bad side effects, "and as with all drugs, women have worse side effects than men."

Most anti-depressants are safe to take during pregnancy and breastfeeding, although there are drugs such as lithium that are not safe for the fetus or infant, she said.

A number of herbal remedies have been shown to be effective, but they have not yet been tested in Canada because they are not standardized. And Seeman warns some herbal remedies have side effects.

Those who do not want to take drugs can try a variety of other treatments including sleep modulation, light therapy, shock treatment, and diet and exercise "which can have a tremendous effect on mood."

Many people mask their depression, she said, and appear cheerful and upbeat. "This is where the family comes in. They have to make sure that the family doctor knows everything that is going on with the patient. Doctors are not always able to pick up on things."

Above all, she said, we need to combat the stigma of mental illness. "It is an illness like any other. Many people do not get treated because they are embarrassed and ashamed. It is not something that needs to be hidden in the closet."

Co-chairs of the campaign are Diane Spivak and Judy Zelikovitz.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I often work out in the evening and find that when I get home and go to bed, I am very hungry. What would be a healthy late night snack for these days?

A. You definitely want to have a snack that includes protein. Try a glass of milk and a piece of fruit, a peanut butter sandwich, a yogurt, cottage cheese and fruit, cereal with milk, or a handful of nuts.

Q. My three-year-old suffers from frequent constipation. What can I give her to alleviate this?

A. There are many things that you can do. First make sure that there isn't something she is currently eating that is leading to the problem. Avoid excessive rice, bananas and dairy products, particularly homo milk. Ensure that she is consuming a significant amount of water, especially when increasing high fibre foods. Use whole wheat, rye or pumpernickel bread; make oatmeal raisin cookies; offer lots of fresh fruit and vegetables; make bran muffins with chocolate chips for increased palatability; make brownies using some baby prune purée in place of some of the fat.

Seniors' housing planned

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) first affordable housing residence in Quebec offering subsidized rents for needier independent seniors will be in Cote St. Luc.

The housing will take the form of a seven-storey apartment building on the south-west corner of Westminster and Cote St. Luc Road, the previous site of the old Cote St. Luc City Hall.

The project is a "natural hit" for B'nai Brith, said BBC-Quebec director Robert Libman, who is also the municipality's mayor.

"There is a definite need for an affordable building for Jewish seniors," Libman said.

Many Jewish seniors live on fixed incomes, have families that no longer live in Montreal to help support them, and feel stranded, he said. B'nai Brith has previously built three such buildings, all in Toronto, the last one about five years ago.

Libman said ground-breaking for the residence could take place within a year, and the building completed by the beginning of 2003.

The chief advantages of the new residence will be its "flexibility," Libman said. It will consist of 95 units, 85 of them one-bedroom apartments, and the building will be bright and cheery and "adapt to a full range of users."

Plans are to include a kitchen on the ground floor and a library, he said.

He stressed that the building is intended for autonomous seniors who don't want to feel that they are living in a "seniors" building. It will also be more user-friendly than seniors residences built 30 or 40 years ago, he said.

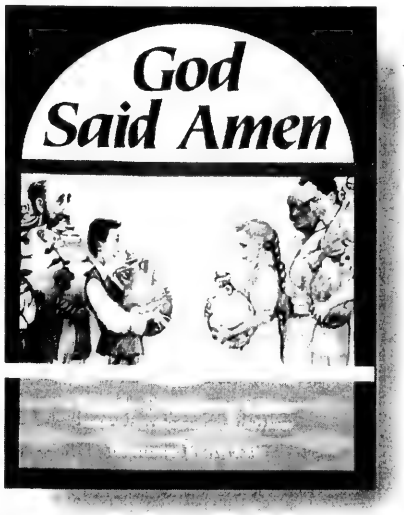
Two kingdoms...one with oil and the other with water

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



One of the things that happens with children, even though they are good friends, is that they get into fights. Often, the fight goes on because neither one wants to be the first to make up.

Come to think of it, adults are no different – which is really sad.

That is the theme of a lovely book by Sandy Eisenberg Sasso called God Said Amen (Jewish Lights, 2000).

You might remember other books by Sasso that were also wonderful. Some of them are God's Paintbrush, A Prayer for the Earth, God In Between and For Heaven's Sake.

God Said Amen is about two kingdoms that were next door to each other, but separated by a valley. The Midnight Kingdom, which was ruled by a Grand Prince, was overflowing with water, but had no oil. As soon as the sun went down, the whole kingdom was in darkness, and the Grand Prince kept banging his shins on the throne and looking for his pyjamas.

The Desert Kingdom, which was ruled by a Grand Princess, had lots and lots of oil, but no water. The gardens wouldn't grow, people couldn't wash their clothes and, worst of all, the princess couldn't get any tea. (Princes and princesses often think that what they need is much more important than what their subjects want.)

When a royal minstrel (a singer who went around letting people know what was going on in other places – after all, there was no television, or telephone or Internet then) told the prince and princess about each other, the prince mounted his royal crane, the princess mounted her royal ostrich, and each rode out to get help from the other person.

That's when the trouble started.

Both the prince and the princess were very proud. The prince decided that if the princess wanted water, she should come and ask him for it. The princess decided that the prince would have to come and ask for oil if he wanted it. Both of them turned around and went back home.

Their servants urged them to go and try again. This time, they came close enough to each other to be attracted – the prince thought that her voice was like the desert wind, and the princess thought that his voice was like the spring rain.

But once again, both were too stubborn to make the first move. They stood and stood and stood, until they were covered with sand. Their people came to find them and realized what had happened. They understood that only by cooperating could both countries be happy.

It's too bad that ordinary people, and even countries, don't follow the message of God Said Amen.

Avi Katz did the pictures in the book, in a very inventive way. All the pictures of The Midnight Kingdom are in blue, the colour of the sea and of the sky. The Desert Kingdom is all beige and yellow, like the sand and the desert and the wind.

This is a terrific book to read with your friends, your family and your parents. Afterwards, there will be lots to talk about.

MAKING MITTENS: The grade three/four class at the Downtown Jewish Day School invited parents to join them to make mittens for the Out of the Cold program for the homeless, held at the Bloor Street United Church. The children also studied Maimonides' levels of tzedakah.

The King's Honour

You can hear the whole story of how Mordechai and Queen Esther saved the Jewish people from evil Haman at your shul or temple on Purim, or read it in the Book of Esther. This excerpt contains additional material from the Midrash.

"Haman, I've got a question for you," declared King Achashverosh to his Prime Minister Haman.

"What is it, your Majesty?" inquired Haman.

"What do you think should be done to the man whom I, the king, wish to honour?"

"Hmm. . ." thought Haman, "he must be talking about me! Who else would he want to honour? Oh boy, this is my lucky day!"

"I think," he replied, "that the man whom the king wishes to honour should wear the king's royal robes, and ride on the king's horse. . . while an important official leads him through the streets of the city and everyone should call out, 'This is what's done for the man whom the king wishes to honour.'"

"Oh boy," he thought to himself. "This should be wonderful!"

"Wow, Haman, what a terrific idea! OK, go do that to Mordechai."

"To who?"

"You know: Mordechai, the Jewish guy who saved my life when Bigthan and Teresh tried to poison me."

"Noooo! I can't do that! I hate Mordechai! It's a. . . family tradition of mine to hate the Jews."

"It was your own idea," returned Achashverosh rather impatiently. "Go, get the purple robes with the jewels sewn on. Get the crown that the citizens of Krein presented me with at my coronation. And get the horse I rode that day. . . I believe its name was Shifragaz."

"Please, don't do this to me! How about — why don't I just give him 10,000 silver ingots instead?"

"Great idea, Haman, do that too!" The king's voice became angrier. "And do it now! I don't want to hear another word from you!"

~ ~ ~ ~ ~

Haman found Mordechai sitting at the city gate with his students. Mordechai was dressed in rags and fasting because the king and Haman had earlier decreed that every Jew in the vast empire of Persia be killed.

"Mordechai," muttered Haman angrily. "Get up! The king has ordered that I honour you. Let me dress you in these royal robes."

"Haman," responded Mordechai, "don't you see that I'm dirty from the rags I'm wearing? I'll need a bath and a haircut first!"

But all the businesses in the royal city of Shushan were closed in honour of the parade. So Haman himself had to bathe Mordechai and cut his hair.

And the entire populace of Shushan watched as 27,000 men holding golden cups and pillows ran before Mordechai while Haman led him through the city streets. And together they all called out, "This is what is done for the man whom the king wishes to honour."

Hockey fans shoot for the stars on Screech Owls

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Imagine being 13 years old and getting paid to do two things you love – playing hockey and acting.

For two local teens, this isn't a fantasy. Jonathan Malen and William Greenblatt star in the hockey-based comedy-drama series Screech Owls, currently airing on YTV Thursdays at 7:30 p.m.

"Filming Screech Owls is a 12-hour day but I love it," Jonathan says. "I'm doing what I like – playing hockey and acting."

William agrees. "I played hockey for five years, it's my most favourite thing in the world. I'm a huge Leaf fan," he says. " In filming Screech Owls, I loved the hockey plus meeting all the new people."

Based on a series of books by Roy MacGregor (co-writer of Ken Dryden's Home Game), Screech Owls is about a Peewee hockey team that can't seem to avoid trouble wherever they play. In between games the players solve life-and-death mysteries.

Jonathan plays Nish, a loud-mouthed comedian and trouble maker. William plays Travis, the team's captain. He's strong-willed and thoughtful and although a small guy, he plays hockey with heart – like William's Maple Leaf heroes.

"I like Gary Roberts' style of play," William says. "He's not a huge guy but he's got a lot of heart. And I like Gary Valk. He works really, really hard and never gives up. It's the style I like to play."

William doesn't think he's much like his character Travis – or does he?

"We're both small and at a disadvantage on the ice," he says. "But Travis is kind of worried all the time and thinks things through whereas I'm impulsive – although he is too, sometimes."

There's no question Jonathan shares Nish's characteristics. "Crazy? Yes. Unpredictable? Yes. Funny? Yes. Likes to have a good time? Yes. Hopefully I'm not as obnoxious."

Jonathan, a Grade 8 Forest Hill student, had his bar mitzvah last October at Holy Blossom Temple. Even though he was on a break from filming Screech Owls at the time, it was chaotic keeping up with school work, learning lines and preparing for the bar mitzvah.

"It was tough but by the time it came, I knew it perfectly," he says.

The series was shot between September and December, so both boys missed four months of school.

"It wasn't a problem," Jonathan notes. "We have a tutor on the set and we get the work from school sent to us. So we're all caught up."

Jonathan, who wants to be a film director when he's older, says acting on Screech Owls was an invaluable experience. "Everyone on the set was awesome. I learned tons of new things – behind the scenes stuff. It was four great months of doing what I like."

William, a Grade 8 student at King Edward Public School, wants to be an actor when he grows up.

"There's not much about acting I don't like [although] the hours can be long and you get home tired and cranky," he says. "But it's good for the long run. It helps build your character.

"I would kind of like to work with the director (Steven Soderbergh) who did Traffic," he says. "And I look up to actors like Kevin Spacey because he can be a funny guy and dramatic. He can do both which is the kind of thing I like to do."

William is an avid reader of MacGregor's books and always imagined playing Travis if they made the TV series. "I didn't think it would happen. Once I got the role, I went 'Cool!'"

So what do a pair of 13-year-olds spend all the money they make on? "I'm saving my money up to buy a nice car to pick up girls with," Jonathan says.

Otherwise, both boys are careful with the money, saving the bulk of it for university. With each role they allow themselves one present.

"For instance," Jonathan says, "if I want a computer I'd set a goal. If I get [a certain] role I'll get the computer and maybe the next role, I'll get PlayStation 2."

William also buys himself one present with each role, but has yet to buy his gift with the Screech Owls money.

"I want to try to get Leaf playoff tickets."

William has been acting since he was seven. Since then he has amassed a long list of credits including a regular role on the Disney series In A Heartbeat and has had roles on Emily of New Moon, Earth: The Final Conflict and Psi-Factor, plus roles in TV-movies.

Jonathan started acting in TV commercials when he was eight. He performed the role of Chip in the local stage production of Beauty and the Beast, starred in a cable thriller Possessed and the Disney pilot Kevin's Castle. On the big screen he played in Bless This Child with Kim Bassinger.

Screech Owls, produced by Shaftesbury Films in Association with YTV is currently airing 13 episodes and will likely get picked up again for next season.

Documentary delves into Ark of the Covenant drama

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Temple Mount, in eastern Jerusalem, galvanizes fervent religious feelings and nationalist emotions. Being the site of the first and second Jewish temples, and of the Muslim Dome of the Rock shrine and the Al-Aksa Mosque, Jews and Arabs both ardently covet it.

British author Richard Andrews claims that the storied Ark of the Covenant is buried beneath the Temple Mount. The ark is supposedly a chest that contains the tablets of Jewish law handed down to Moses. It has not been seen since the Babylonians' destruction of Jerusalem.

Jewish political extremists believe that if the ark is unearthed, the Messiah will appear and the Third Temple will be rebuilt.

Some Jewish radicals, having read and praised Andrews' book, Blood on the Mountain, have enthusiastically embraced his theory. They believe that if they blow up the Dome of the Rock and Al-Aksa, they can build the Third Temple and find the elusive ark.

The connection between the ark and the Temple Mount is the subject of Nir Toib's fascinating and chilling documentary, The Ark of the Covenant, which will be broadcast on Vision TV on Thursday, March 15 at 9 p.m.

The Ark of the Covenant, nearly one hour in length, explores Andrews' hypothesis, features the Jews who would destroy the mosque and the shrine, and provides a bit of background about the tensions that have plagued East Jerusalem since its conquest by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War. It also profiles a mystical American who has spent the past three decades looking for the ark.

The substance of Andrews' theory turns on his contention that secret tunnels lie under the Temple Mount. They have apparently been detected from the air by infrared cameras.

Although he considers the ark "a great legendary relic" and is mesmerized by the prospect of finding it one day, he warns that its discovery could unleash a world-wide war should the Dome of the Rock and Al-Aksa be attacked by Jewish zealots.

There are no shortage of candidates who might be tempted. Indeed, since 1969, there have been several attempts to demolish these Muslim holy places.

This accounts for the fact that Israel's secret service keeps a close watch over these Jewish radicals.

We're introduced to several of them, notably Rabbi Israel Ariel of the Temple Mount Institute, Gershon Salomon of the Temple Mount Faithful, and Joel Lerner, a fanatic who has been charged with planning acts of terrorism on the Temple Mount.

Salomon's mild-mannered demeanour belies his views. He describes Islam as "foreign pagan worship" and calls on Israel to send Palestinian Arabs " back to Mecca."

In 1990, Salomon and his demented followers touched off serious riots when they tried to lay a cornerstone for the Third Temple on the Temple Mount.

Shortly after the Six Day War, Dennis Michael Rohan, an unbalanced Australian tourist, set fire to Al-Aksa. A little more than a decade later, Alan Goodman, an American acolyte of Rabbi Meir Kahane, went on a shooting rampage on the Temple Mount.

Wendell Jones, a bearded and eccentric American who has been poking into caves around the Dead Sea since the early 1970s in pursuit of the ark, is not an extremist like Rohan or Goodman. His description of himself as a "romantic mystic" is probably accurate.

One doesn't imagine that he will stumble upon the ark any time soon. But his quest remains intriguing.

NEW PRODUCTION TO BE MOUNTED OF TORONTO PLAYWRIGHT'S AWARD-WINNING BROADWAY PLAY

Who says the theatre is dead? Here is news of not one but two exciting productions involving young upcoming Canadian playwrights handling Jewish themes.

As you read in this column several months back, Daniel Goldfarb is a 20-something former Torontonian living in the Big Apple whose play, Adam Baum and the Jew Movie, won the Oppenheimer Award last year as the best Newcomer to Broadway.

Now CanStage is mounting a Canadian production of Goldfarb's "snappy clever comedy" as part of its upcoming season. The play is set in 1946 and focuses on a Jewish movie mogul who commissions a WASP screenwriter to produce a script on anti-Semitism.

Goldfarb's opus is in good company. CanStage's 2001-2002 season also includes productions of Shakespeare's The Tempest, Steven Martin's Picasso at the Lapin Agile, Judith Thompson's Habitat, Tom Stoppard's India Ink and a treatment of Margaret Atwood's novel The Edible Woman scripted by Dave Carley. (details at www.canstage.com)

Those who follow the Toronto theatre scene will have heard of local playwright Adam Pettle, whose play Zadie's Shoes captured enthusiastic reviews and sold out an extended run recently at the Factory Theatre. Now the Mirvishes have arranged to mount a new production of Zadie's Shoes next March in the Winter Garden. (details at www.mirvish.com)

Beth Tikvah Concert: Music for Passover, Beth Tikvah's third annual gala spring concert of music by Srul Irving Glick, features Susan Hoeppner on flute; Lori Gemmel, harp; Valerie Siren, soprano; Cecilia Ignatieff, piano, the Festival String Quartet – Mark Skazinetzky and Sergei Nikonov, violins, Christopher Redfield, viola, Marie Gelinas, cello; the Beth Tikvah Choir and members of Lachan (Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir); and conductor Srul Irving Glick.

Proceeds from the concert benefit Homes for Adults with Autism and Pervasive Developmental Disorders (HAADD), a non-profit grassroots organization, as well as Reena, a non-profit social service agency working with developmentally disabled adults.

Tuesday, March 27, 8 p.m. 3080 Bayview Ave. $15 in advance, $20 at the door, $10 for seniors and students. 416-221-3433, ext. 358.

Purim Celebrations: A puppet show, carnival games, costumes, graggers, hamantaschen and other refreshments are all offered at the Winchevsky Centre's Community Purim Celebration. Members $6, non-members $8, students free. 585 Cranbrooke Ave. Sunday, March 4, 10:30 a.m.

Alternatively, you may wish to attend Purim Day, a Cubecity Musical presented by P.M. Productions. Trinity Workshop Theatre, 819 Sherbourne St. March 2 and 3, 8 p.m. 416-944-1493.

* * *

Symphony Notes: Known for his affinity for the Russian masters, pianist Yefim Bronfman plays a program of Rachmaninoff and Brahms with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Jiri Belohlavek. Roy Thomson Hall, May 16 and 17, 8 p.m. $25-$85. 416-593-4828 or www.tso.on.ca.

Arts Briefs

• Veteran Canadian actor Paul Soles has been signed to play Shylock in next season's production of The Merchant of Venice at Stratford. The role had originally been assigned to actor Al Waxman, who died Jan. 17 after complications from heart surgery.

• The Danny Grossman Dance Company presents This is Heaven to Me, a "gritty exploration of a man's struggle to exist between the cracks of fantasy and reality," set in a 1920s train station. Buddies in Bad Times Theatre. $15-$18. March 1 to 10, 8 p.m. 416-975-8555.

• Fame, the Musical, opens March 27 at the Pantages Theatre. Runs to April 9. $36.50-$81. 416-870-8000.

•Legendary Broadway sensation Bernadette Peters performs selections from her career and personal favourites with members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Thursday, April 19, 7 p.m. $95-$50. Roy Thomson Hall. 416-593-4828. Call 416-593-7769, ext. 317 for tickets to $350 gala.

At the Galleries

• The Art Gallery of Ontario presents Greg Curnoe, Life and Stuff, an exhibition of works by Curnoe, a Canadian artist who was killed last November. On view March 9 to June 17. Also at the AGO is Paris Itineraries: The Photographs of Eugene Atget, an early French photographer (Until May 27).

• Celebrating A Lifetime of Art and Vision, a show of recent works by physician-artist Dr. Joseph Leventhal. Opens March 28, 7 to 9 p.m. Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. Until April 30

•Into The Third Millennium is a show of paintings by Olga Kletsky, running until March 3 at the Upper Gallery 7 (118 Scollard Ave.) . A Russian immigrant, Kletsky is inspired by science, dance and philosophy. Her style is best expressed as "realistic surrealism" where surrealist realm supports representational forms.

Ruth Lowe Story

I'll Never Smile Again is the story of Ruth Lowe, of the tragedies of her early years and of how those tragedies, combined with her remarkable musical talents, produced her phenomenal achievements as a songwriter and musical pioneer. Lowe penned the song that launched the career of Frank Sinatra. I'll Never Smile Again is part of the series The Canadians – Biographies of a Nation, airing on History Television, Wednesday March 7 at 9 p.m.

In defence of Poetry: A conversation with Ken Sherman

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto native Ken Sherman loved fishing as a boy at Jackson's Point, where his family had a summer cottage. But these days, whenever he tosses out a line, it's usually a line of poetry.

Sherman, 50, is celebrating the publication of his 10th book — The Well: New and Selected Poems (Wolsak and Wynn, 120 pp., $14). His ninth volume of poetry contains 24 new poems and many others from previous collections such as Snake Music (1978), The Cost of Living (1981), Jackson's Point (1989) and Clusters (1997).

A creative writing instructor at Sheridan College and the University of Toronto, Sherman often returns via his poetry to his boyhood, the summer landscapes of rural Ontario, and the eternal mysteries that lie beneath the illusory surface of life. Many of his poems explore themes of Jewish identity.

In A View, the poem that opens the collection, an adult narrator sits on an "ancient pier / watching patches of mist / lift from the lake / like ghosts reluctant to go." A neighbouring island will appear soon, he assures us, and a visit there will provide a relatively rewarding view back to the pier; he went there as a child. But the most spectacular perspectives, he says, occur beneath the water's surface in "the deep", which holds "a silent richness we're meant to visit, not inhabit."

A similar fascination with the murky depths occurs in the title poem, The Well. As richly detailed as a short story, the piece reflects the author's typical preoccupation with the black void of death. Its narrator tells of hearing, as a boy, a radio report of a lad who had fallen down a dried-out well. Lying in bed, he had imagined the other boy "trapped in a darkness more terrifying than the darkness that surrounded my bed."

As evidenced by this new collection, Sherman is a gifted writer of crisp, evocative poetry that is both accessible and meaningful. He also pens critical essays (a collection of them, Void and Voice, appeared several years ago) and compelling short stories, as witness the piece that appears in the latest issue of Parchment.

He's written a short wonderful memoir of growing up in an apartment above the family tailor shop on College Street in Toronto; and no doubt much else.

Asked why he prefers poetry, probably the least popular of modern literary forms, he offers a wry smile. "First of all, I'm not sure that a writer chooses the form that he writes in — I sometimes think that the form chooses the writer. And I like the intensity of poetry. I think that every single poem, if it's successful, gives you an illumination, a kind of spiritual awakening."

In any case, popularity isn't everything in literature, he adds. He cites the case of Franz Kafka – "one of the greatest writer of the 20th century, who was unknown when he passed away except to a small circle of friends."

If poetry is unpopular, it's more an indictment of our post-literate culture than of poetry itself, he implies.

"Poetry demands a degree of concentration that fewer and fewer people have. What distinguishes a poem from a short story is that a poem demands to be reread: you don't get it on the first reading. In fact, sometimes you have to read it several times before it unfolds itself. We live in a world of rapid transit thinking, and fewer people have the ability or the will to spend that kind of time on a piece of literature."

He closes his defence of poetry by observing that much of the Bible is written in poetry — "so if it's good enough for God, it's good enough for human beings."

Married with children, Sherman writes mostly on summer holidays and weekends. The muse struck him relatively early in life, he says. "I was 12 years old and our English teacher had read Emily Dickinson's poem, Because I Could Not Stop For Death. It had a huge impact on me, hearing that poem. I was walking home from school – it was a cold wintry day – and I found lines just coming and welling up inside of me. When I got home I ran upstairs and wrote out the lines and I had my first poem."

He counts Dickinson, A.M. Klein, Leonard Cohen, Albert Camus and Ernest Hemingway among his influences. Irving Layton, whom he first encountered at York University in 1969, became a mentor.

"Irving used to say to me as encouragement, 'If you've written one good poem, you'll do it again.' I never quite understood why he was saying this, and I guess it's because of this fear we have about this miracle not happening again."

He acknowledges that the scope of poetic imagination has retreated enormously since the days, for example, of the romantic poets ("Shelley, Keats, Coleridge, all those people") whose works he studied in graduate school.

Whereas poets once wrote about the whole world, he says, today they limit themselves to the interior world of the human spirit.

"I would say that the spiritual journey that poetry takes us on is the most important journey in our lives. It's certainly more important than any political or any materialistic journey."

He is nothing if not a connoisseur of literature. A shelf behind him holds dozens of books. We trade opinions of various titles including Henry James's The Ambassadors and Joseph Conrad's The Secret Agent.

"God owes each of us a second life," he declares, "so we can read all the great books that we're not going to read in this lifetime."

Business Profile

Internet entrepreneur cashes in on strategic vision

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Computers and the Internet have accelerated just about everything in our lives. Communications are faster, information retrieval is instantaneous, fortunes are made and lost at megabyte speed and the pace of life has accelerated commensurately.

Meet Jesse Rasch, Internet entrepreneur, Gen X high achiever and a homegrown poster boy for the kind of high-tech success story most often associated with Silicon Valley or the Pacific northwest. At 25, Rasch is already at the top of his game, CEO of a successful Internet operation and with more money than he could ever have imagined.

Rasch is co-founder and chairman of InQuent Technologies Inc., a Toronto-based e-commerce firm that provides its clients with a variety of Web-based products.

In the techno-speak of the company's promotional material, InQuent is described as a "provider of hosting products and services…The company enables its partners to extend their business product portfolio and extend to their customers a suite of hosting solutions. InQuent provides its partners with turnkey and customized Internet and application hosting solutions."

Translation: InQuent provides its customers with a presence on the Internet, supplies the software to make it work, and allows its wholesale customers the wherewithal to offer their retail clients a variety of online benefits.

"We are like a landlord in a shopping mall, providing the electricity and security," Rasch explained. The ethereal Internet infrastructure includes a server computer to host a Web site, software to make it run, a domain name, Web security, shopping carts (to allow its customers to sell online) – a total "online environment."

InQuent also offers supply chain management software, to facilitate inventory control, and personnel management software, which permits clients' managers to keep tabs on employees and customers. Perhaps InQuent's most innovative product is its browser-based software that allows clients to manage their Internet sites from remote locations, without the necessity of calling in technical support.

"We're a platform service provider that takes existing software and configures it to be accessible," Rasch explained.

That business model has propelled InQuent into the industry lead on an international scale."Today we have an enormous lock" on the market, with clients in 147 countries, Rasch said. Remarkably, InQuent was able to expand without incurring any debt. Its growth was financed entirely through cash flow.

InQuent's global customers include a who's who of blue chip operators. KPN Telecom, Holland's largest telecommunications player, is one; Comcast and Lockheed Martin in the United States are two others. Bell Canada is a local client. U.S. giant, SBC Communications, which is ranked No. 12 on the Fortune 500 and which counts Ameritch and Southwestern Bell among its subsidiaries, started as one of its biggest customers and is now a majority owner of the company. More about that later.

Jesse Rasch

Although he won't be specific as to InQuent's revenues and earnings – it's not publicly traded – Rasch acknowledges revenue is in "the eight figures and we're growing strong." The rate of growth on an annualized basis has been in the hundreds or thousands percent.

The company employs more than 200 people, mostly in Canada but with some staff in the United States.

Only three and a half years ago, InQuent, then known as WebHosting.com, gave little indication of a sunny future. The startup was run out of a students' apartment near McGill University where Rasch and his partner, Michael Apted, lived.

WebHosting.com may not have looked like much back then, but a closer examination of Rasch's record as an entrepreneur would have suggested big things were on the horizon. When he was 15, he started his first business, working on contract with real estate developers to place signs announcing open houses. By the end of his first summer, Rasch had eight guys working for him, plenty of cash in his pocket and the satisfaction of being his own boss.

When he was 17, he sold the venture to his employees, but was hooked on running his own business. "It was exciting," he said. "I always enjoyed selling, dealing with people, growing a business and thinking of ways to outmaneuvre the competition."

It was an attitude he took with him to McGill University in Montreal, where he studied marine biology.

Rasch had no real desire for a university education. He went reluctantly after being encouraged by his mother with the proviso that if he found a good business opportunity, he'd focus on that.

It didn't take long for his university career to fizzle and his business career to blossom. Pretty soon he and Apted were skipping classes while running their own company developing Web sites. His proximity to McGill and Concordia proved fortuitous, with the universities providing an endless supply of talented programmers and code-writers.

"Our attendance was suffering at McGill, but we realized when the orders came in that we had an opportunity for a world-wide source of revenue."

Web design evolved into Web hosting as clients, unwilling to maintain the sites, asked Rasch to do the job. They partnered with a U.S. company to provide the service, but "they did a bad job and it reflected on us."

Instead, "we decided to do it on our own. We created the technology and we hung out our shingle. The orders started trickling in from around the world," Rasch said.

At the time, few companies offered software that allowed clients to manage their own sites through an Internet browser.

Rasch handled the company's business development, Apted was in charge of the technology. In the summer of 1998, their apartment resembled Union Station at rush hour – without the air conditioning. It was so crowded,"you couldn't breathe in there."

Expansion was inevitable, but the question was, where? They chose Toronto over Montreal, but it was never really a contest. Quebec's "draconian language laws didn't make sense for our company," Rasch said.

Their first location in TO was a puny 1,600-square-foot office on Sherbourne, which they quickly outgrew. From there, it was on to a 7,500 sq. ft facility on Peter Street, in the city's trendy downtown. Hip restaurants and night clubs were nearby and for the company's youthful workforce, going for a drink after an 18-hour workday presented an ideal lifestyle.

Despite the long hours, the work environment was excellent, Rasch said. All employees received share purchase options and the camaraderie made for an employee churn rate of less than two percent a year.

It was perfect – for about a year.

With 140 employees, InQuent' s workspace was bursting at the seams. Employees worked in the hallways while a dozen software developers shared a billiard room.

Another move followed. Currently, InQuent is located in a 20,000 sq. foot facility in a downtown office tower, but even that's not big enough. The company is looking to double its space.

Last summer, Texas-based SBC Communications completed a deal that had been in the works since early 1999. SBC had approached Rasch with a proposal to buy the company and after three months of negotiations, a deal was struck in which SBC paid $115 million U.S. in cash for 51 percent of InQuent.

"We saw a great opportunity to work with a large, international telecommunications company," Rasch said. "We saw a huge distribution channel and a strategic opportunity to sell through the huge telecom."

Rasch remained a major shareholder in InQuent as well as the company's strategic planner. Ken Wilson was hired recently as president and CEO.

Wilson's addition has allowed Rasch to cut down from his time in the office, from 18 hours a day to a more manageable 12. Never one to sit still, the cut has also freed up some time to pursue his passion, "spending time with other start-ups."

Rasch has his irons in several fires, helping launch private technology companies in southern Ontario.

"I prefer to focus on Canadian companies because I love this country. The people are great, the tax situation is improving and I want to help Canadians grow the economy and become a more strategic player in the world.

"The challenge of growing things is what I'm interested in."

He's also becoming more actively involved in "venture philanthropy," a relatively new phenomenon promoted by successful young entrepreneurs.

Philanthropic foundations "sponsor initiatives from social entrepreneurs, who have a social agenda that I agree with, who want to make things better." But they are based on a venture capital model and they are required to present a financial plan and show results before they can re-qualify for subsequent grants, he said.

And in his down time? No real surprise and no reduction in pace. Rasch enjoys adventure sports like scuba diving, rock climbing and driving Formula 1 racing cars.

"Life is always busy," he says.

Who wants to be a Jewish sports maven?

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — If the American television program, Who Wants to be a Millionaire? is any indication, North Americans love trivia and enjoy vicariously playing along with contestants who nervously strive to attain the jackpot of $1 million (and more).

Several months ago, I prepared a list of trivia questions for a class on Judaism and sport at the Midrasha High School in Hamilton. The following Jewish sports questions were presented to the youngsters at Midrasha, with a number of updated queries added to the list.

Try these on for size. Ready for your "final answers"?

1. Several Jewish players such as Lyle Alzado of the L.A. Raiders, Ed Newman of the Miami Dolphins, John Frank and Harris Barton of the San Francisco 49ers have performed in the Super Bowl. Name the player who played in last month's game in a New York Giants uniform.

2. Which Jewish pitcher led the majors in wins with 25 and won the Cy Young Award in 1980?

3. Who was the founder and editor of Ring magazine, known as the boxing bible?

4. People magazine has recognized him as one of the Fifty Most Beautiful People of 2000. He was the three-time gold medal winner for the backstroke at the Sydney Olympics. His name?

5. He is known simply as Goldberg in the world of pro wrestling. What is the signature move of this rippling muscle mass of intensity, the move that invariably does in his opponents?

6. Which position did Al "Flip" Rosen play for so many years with the Cleveland Indians?

7. Who is the only Jewish manager in the major leagues today and which team is he with?

8. Detroit catcher Brad Ausmus, who led all receivers in fielding average in 1999, was recently traded to which National League team for the second time?

9. A former ESPN sportscaster and current CBS sideline reporter (female) roamed throughout the Super Bowl in January and gave supplementary reports to listeners. Her name?

10. Which Jewish boxer was the youngest athlete to win an Olympic gold medal? He twice held the welterweight title in the late 1920s and early '30s.

11. How frequently are the Maccabiah Games held in Israel and when do they again take place?

12. In what year did left-hander Sandy Koufax refuse to pitch in the first game of the World Series against the Minnesota Twins because it was Yom Kippur?

13. In the history of the World Series, three Jews have been named Most Valuable Player. Name them.

Sandy Koufax

14. Who holds the career record for wins by a Jewish pitcher?

15. Last season, two hurlers of the Jewish persuasion toiled for the American League Anaheim Angels. Who were they?

16. Which female track star is considered the greatest woman track and field athlete of all time? Which country did she represent? (She won medals in each of the first four Olympics she competed in.)

17. Who was the first Israeli to play college baseball in the United States?

18. Who is the three-time winner of the Indianapolis 500 who was of the Jewish faith?

19. In August 1966, this Jewish outfielder with the New York Mets homered in four consecutive times at bat. Who was he?

20. Who was the last Jewish coach of the Canadian Football League's Winnipeg Blue Bombers? (Hint: He predates the 1970s.)

21. Walter "Mousy" Blum became famous in what sport in the 1950s and '60s?

22. Which two Jewish head coaches' teams have won the NCAA basketball tournament?

23. Which player who starred in college at the University of Tennessee and later played in the NBA is presently the GM of the Milwaukee Bucks?

24. Which Jewish Winnipegger played briefly for the New York Rangers in 1943-44? Which Jewish Montrealer played for the Rangers in the early '50s?

25. The Chicago Bears QB elected to the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 1965 was...?

Answers:

1. Mike Rosenthal, offensive line
2. Steve Stone, Baltimore Orioles
3. Nat Fleisher
4. Lenny Krazelburg
5. The Jackhammer
6. Third base
7. Larry Rothschild, Tampa Bay
8. Houston Astros
9. Bonnie Berstein
10. Jackie Fields, 16 years old
11. Every four years; next in July 2001
12. 1965
13. Larry Sherry, (1959), Sandy Koufax (1965), Steve Yeager (1981) Jewish convert
14. Ken Holtzman, 174 wins in 15 seasons with the Cubs, A's, Orioles and Yankees
15. Al Levine, Scott Schoeneweis
16. Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinksa, Poland – seven Olympic medals, three of them gold, at the 1964, '68, '72 and '76 games
17. Dan Rothem, pitcher with Georgia Southern 1998-99
18. Mauri Rose
19. Art Shamsky
20. Allie Sherman (1950s, pre-Bud Grant)
21. Thoroughbred horse racing jockey
22. Nat Holman (CCNY); Larry Brown (Kansas)
23. Ernie Grunfeld
24. Max Labovitch and Hy Buller
25. Sid Luckman

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

אהבתי כל-כך מאת: יהודית רותם

יהודית רותם, סופרת ישראלית, אם לשבעה ילדים שנטשה את העולם החרדי, מוכרת לקהל הקוראים מספריה אחות רחוקה וקריעה. רותם ידועה גם מתרומתה לאנתולוגיות שונות, ביניהן קוראות מבראשית שם כתבה סיפור/מדרש מודרני על שרה אמנו.

ציר הרומן אהבתי כל-כך מתמקד בסיפור חייה של אשה על ערש דווי; את הסיפור היא מספרת לאחייניתה. הקשישה, גבריאלה מנהיים, מבלה את שארית ימיה בבית אבות יהודי בברלין ובאמור, הסיפור מושמע לבת אחיה, נעמי קליין מתל-אביב. רב המשותף בין שתי הנשים. שתיהן מרדו במוסכמות ושתיהן הכבשות השחורות במשפחה, כל אחת בדורה שלה. סיפורה של נעמי מתפתח כתגובה לסיפור חייה של גבי (גבריאלה). בשלב זה, גבי, אשה בערוב ימיה, אינה חוששת לחשוף את הכל. "הזיקנה בעיני גיל יקר. זמן ההגזות. אחרי שכתבנו את חסיפור שלנו... ושום דבר חדש לא יקרה בו - זה הזמן לתיקונים אחרונים של היצירה המרכזית..."

לעלילה נכנסת גם בתה של נעמי, נציגת הדור השלישי, אך תפקידה משני בסיפור. (לי, אישית הפריעה צלע שלישית זו ברומן.)

לגבי מנהיים סיפור מורכב ומייגע שתחילתו בבודפשט. מבחינה ספרותית מצאתי שתאורי החיים בהונגריה שלפני השואה היו הקטעים המרשימים ביותר בספר. בצל ידיעתנו את אשר בא על יהודי הונגריה בשואה הופך הסיפור למדהים עוד יותר.

גבריאלה קליין נולדה לזוג סוחרים אמיד. ההורים היו יהודים אורתודוכסים שחיו על-פי כללים מחמירים. "הכל מתחיל בהורים... אבא ואמא שלי זכרונם לברכה. בליבי אני קוראת להם תמיד אוניוקה ואופוקה - אמאלה ואבאלה." הילדה חשה ניכור מהוריה והיחסים בבית היו מרים ועכורים. ההשפעה האוסטרו-הונגרית הוסיפה שכבות של נוקשות לתעיר-בורגנות של המשפחה היהודית. "ההורים לא דיברו עם ילדיהם. לא הסבירו, לא חיבקו, לא נגעו, רק נזפו והטיפו מוסר מבוקר ועד ערב." בעיני עצמה, לגבי היה נדמה שהיא "כאבק מטלית מדיפה ממקום למקום."

במהלך חייה עושה גבי מספר נסיונות להימלט מאטימות רגשית זו אך מה שנדמה לה כעונג הצלה, גבר זה או אחר, סופו שהופך למילכוד נפשי מסוג אחר. שלושה בעלים היו לגבי בשלוש ארצות: הונגריה, ישראל וגרמניה. לא הקומוניזם ולא הציונות הביאו לה את הרגיעה ואת האושר שבאהבה.

לנעמי סיפור משלה; היא עזבה את העולם החרדי והיה עליה לוותר על בעל ובנים (רק את הבת נתנו לה לקחת). נעמי שואבת הבנה רבה מהשאלות הנדלות בחיי דודתה כאילו גבריאלה הגישה לה את חייה ואמרה לנעמי: חיי אותם! "הדמעות שלנו הן כמו שני ערוצי נחל שהתחברו. הרגשות שלי מחלחלים לתוך רגשותיה של דודתי. סיפורי נשזר בסיפורה."

אהבתי כל-כך היה לרב-מכר בארץ.

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

What would Purim be without Hamantaschen, those delectable three-cornered pastries shaped like Haman's three-cornered hat! They come in an assortment of sizes and flavours. The filling can be enclosed in sweet yeast dough, cookie dough, flaky cream cheese pastry or even phyllo dough.

Popular fillings include poppy seeds (muhn), prunes (lekvar), dates, apricots, apples, thick jam or preserves. Fill them with a chocolate kiss (or hug!) or a spoonful of chocolate hazelnut spread. Kids love them filled with peanut butter mixed with mini chocolate chips, topped with a dab of jam.

The symbolic foods of Purim are connected with Haman and Queen Esther. To avoid breaking kosher dietary laws, Queen Esther lived in the palace on a vegetarian diet. Poppy seeds are symbolic of Queen Esther's three day fast. When she broke her fast at night, she ate only seeds while she prayed to God to repeal Haman's decree.

Triangular-shaped foods such as cheese kreplach or challah shaped like a giant triangle, sprinkled with poppy seeds are other symbolic foods served by Ashkenazi Jews. Sephardi Jews serve Haman's ears – deep-fried strips of dough or kichel dipped in sugar syrup or sprinkled with icing sugar.

Mishloach manot/shalach mones (food gifts) of fruit, candy and cookies are sent to friends and family. It is considered a mitzvah to send them to the elderly and the needy. This year, why not make poppy seed cookies cut in triangular shapes? A fluted pastry wheel will make them look so pretty! This dough can also be used to make traditional hamantaschen.

HAMAN'S HATS

2 eggs
¾ cup sugar
½ cup oil
¼ cup orange juice
2 tsp. baking powder
3 cups flour
¼ cup poppy seeds
Additional sugar for dipping

Beat eggs with sugar, oil and orange juice until well mixed. Add baking powder, flour and poppy seeds. Mix to make a soft dough. (Can be done in the food processor.)

Divide dough into 4 pieces. Roll each piece on a floured surface into a rectangle about ⅛ inch thick. Cut in triangles with a fluted pastry wheel or pizza cutter. Dip each cookie lightly in sugar. Place sugar-side up on a sprayed cookie sheet. Bake at 375 for 8 to 10 minutes, until golden. Makes 4 to 5 dozen.

Iraqi Jews recall expropriations

Fifty years ago, properties confiscated

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Fifty years ago, before the idea of Scud missiles raining down on Israeli cities was even a pipedream in the minds of Iraqi tyrants, the Jews of Iraq lived a precarious existence.

Although Jews had resided in the Tigris-Euphrates basin for thousands of years, by the early 1940s they were the target of government-sanctioned rioting and persecution. With the creation of the State of Israel in May 1948, new sanctions were implemented against them, culminating 50 years ago on March 10, 1951, with legislation that, in effect, impoverished them.

Meeting in a closed session that excluded the country's five Jewish legislators, the Iraqi parliament passed a law that froze the assets of thousands of Jews who had indicated their intention to leave the country. Those who wished to emigrate could do so – but only if they renounced their citizenship and left their property behind. Faced with persistent anti-Jewish unrest, most of the country's Jewish population departed, carrying with them not much more than a suitcase and a token amount of cash. An estimated 5,000 Jews remained behind.

Special Report
Please see related stories on pages 9, 12 and 40.

From 1948-51, approximately 123,500 Iraqi-born Jews settled in Israel. Iraq allowed them to take only 50 dinars per adult ($140) and 20 dinars per child. The windfall to the Iraqi treasury was substantial. Baghdad native Sasson Mayer, whose family had an interest in a lucrative textile concern, estimates $200 million U.S. was left behind while some Jewish organizations place the figure closer to $460 million U.S.

Either way, Mayer, a retired Toronto businessman, believes the claims of Iraqi Jews to confiscated property should be used to counterbalance Palestinian claims for lost property in the State of Israel.

"My goal is to let the world know that when we talk about reparations and refugees, we have to tell the world, hey, what about our

JOY REIGNS IN THE CITY SHUSHAN

This drawing by 10-year-old Izaak Atnikov of Regina expresses the mood and the ultimate message of the holiday of Purim. Joy reigned in the city of Shushan because of the faith, courage, wisdom and determination of the leaders of the people of that Diaspora community so many years ago. Their example is a lesson we must somehow learn and apply today. See pages 26 and 27 for our Purim poster.

Jewish Studies

VANCOUVER — The two largest universities in British Columbia plan to expand Jewish studies. The University of British Columbia is seeking a donor to fund a chair in Jewish law and ethics, and a professor of English at Simon Fraser University is shepherding a proposal to create a Jewish studies program there.

Romanians Excluded?

MONTREAL — Many Romanian Holocaust survivors are getting a raw deal when it comes to restitution, charges the Association of Romanian Jewish Survivors of the Holocaust. Association president Issie Veisfeld says the current fund set up by the German government and industries to compensate slave and forced labourers targets only those Romanian Jews who were incarcerated in Transnistria, an area in modern Ukraine, and not Jews who were enslaved in Romania proper. Veisfeld is urging survivors and their families to press their case with local German consulates.

Cantor 'Discontinued'

TORONTO — The board of Temple Har Zion in Thornhill has announced that "it has become necessary" to "discontinue" the employment of Cantor Martin Steinhouse, who had served the congregation for 27 years. In a recent letter to temple members, president Claude Heimann gave no reason for the development, but said "it was an agonizing decision... [made] after very careful consideration."

UJA Campaign

EDMONTON — This city's 2000 United Jewish Appeal campaign reached $646,000, a 15 percent card-for-card increase over last year. A total of 1,039 donors contributed to the campaign.

ISRAEL

Rich on Pardon

JERUSALEM — Fugitive financier Marc Rich called his pardon a "humanitarian act" and said his 18 years of exile in Europe and Israel were necessary because he would not have received a fair trial in the United States. Rich's comments last week were his first public statements since he was pardoned by former president Bill Clinton in January. Several prominent Israeli and American Jewish leaders and organizations accepted contributions from Rich and wrote letters on his behalf.

Female Soldiers

JERUSALEM — Israel's Orthodox Chief Rabbinate Council opposes having female soldiers serve in combat positions, saying it harms their femininity and distracts male soldiers. The Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported last week that the council warned in a letter to the Israel Defence Forces' chief of staff that if the situation is not changed, it could affect the recruitment of soldiers into the hesder program, which combines yeshiva study with army service.

WORLD

Probe Requested

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is asking the U.S. Congress to launch a full-scale investigation into the disappearance of the chief of the Gestapo. Heinrich Mueller is believed to have been in the Berlin bunker with Adolf Hitler in April 1945, but vanished soon afterward.

Pardon Probed

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating former president Clinton's pardon of four chassidic men in upstate New York convicted of stealing government funds by creating a phony yeshiva. The office is examining whether Clinton offered the commutations in exchange for chassidic votes for his wife in last year's race for a U.S. Senate seat.

Survivors Sue

NEW YORK — A group of Holocaust survivors sued Austria in a U.S. court last week for property and assets seized during the Nazi era. The lawsuit represented a rejection of the deal reached last month among survivors' representatives, the Austrian government and the former Clinton administration. Lawyers for the plaintiffs say the deal, under which Austria agreed to pay more than $300 million, is inadequate.

Yahoo! Won't Budge

NEW YORK — Yahoo! is refusing to meet a deadline imposed by a French court to halt the sale of Nazi memorabilia accessible on its Web site by the end of the week. A spokesperson for the Internet portal said the company has no intention of complying with the ruling, issued by a Paris court last November. The judge declared Yahoo! would be fined up to $14,000 per day for ignoring the ruling, but the issue may be moot because the company says it has nearly eliminated all auctions of Nazi goods from its site.

Roth Wins

NEW YORK — Philip Roth's The Human Stain has won the National Jewish Book Awards' fiction prize, making Roth a three-time winner of the award.

Jews Back Communists in Moldova

CHISINAU, Moldova — The mostly elderly Jewish community of Moldova joined much of the country in backing the Communist party's stunning electoral victory last week.

The ongoing economic crisis in Europe's poorest country fuelled the Communists' victory in Moldova, a former Soviet republic of approximately 4.5 million people that lies between Ukraine and Romania.

"I don't really believe the Communist comeback means any revolutionary change. It is all economically motivated. All people, including Jews, are sick and tired of the economic collapse, the poverty, the terrible unemployment," said Nora Leoshkevitch, the editor of a Jewish newspaper in Chisinau, the capital.

Jewish organizations in Chisinau, better known to Jews as Kishinev, said middle-aged and elderly Jews – the majority in the roughly 30,000-strong Jewish community – voted for the Communists out of nostalgia and a desire for increased social services, while younger Jewish voters opted for pro-Western parties.

But younger Jews are becoming rare in Moldova. Most have already immigrated to Israel, the United States, Russia or Germany, or are preparing to do so.

Web site decision seen as precedent-setting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A panel of the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) has begun deliberation on a landmark case to determine whether federal human rights legislation applies to the Internet.

The case, which focuses on material on a Web site purported to be operated by Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, raises the question of whether the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) has jurisdiction over content transmitted into Canada from a computer server in the United States.

The original complaint against the Web site – known as Zundelsite – was brought by Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron, a longtime nemesis of Zundel. She argued content on the site violated Section 13(1) of the CHRA, which prohibits telephonic communication that would bring hatred or contempt on an identifiable group, in this case, the Jews.

The Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations joined the case as complainant, while Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre intervened to support the legislation. The Canadian Association for Free Expression (CAFE), represented by one-time teacher Paul Fromm, intervened to argue against the section.

The case wound off and on for nearly four years, during which approximately 20 witnesses testified through the course of 52 hearing days. The case dragged on so long that one member of the three-person panel withdrew from the case, leaving chair Claude Pensa and panel member Reva Devins to adjudicate the matter.

Adding to the bizarre twists and turns of the case – which included sensational testimony into the inner workings of Zundel's Carlton Street "bunker" from his ex-wife Irene – was the news released just prior to final arguments that Zundel had taken up residence in the United States with his new wife, Ingrid Rimland. Zundel had contended the Web site was owned and controlled by Rimland, though that position was contradicted by Irene Zundel, who testified Zundel edited it and paid for it from Toronto.

As a result of his move, Zundel was unrepresented during the final phase of the hearing.

His lawyer, Barbara Kulaszka, suggested in a letter to the tribunal that her client was part of the "brain drain" to the United States. She argued his move rendered the case "moot" – without a valid legal controversy that should be adjudicated.

Pensa, however, pointed out there was no evidence as to Zundel's location and final arguments proceeded in his absence.

Purim as a pilot light

From the editor's desk

The centerpiece of this issue of The CJN, literally, is a poster of 12 different Purim scenes as imagined by 12 different youngsters in grades 1 through 6.

This is the seventh such annual poster that The CJN has produced. The pleasure and excitement in doing so have not diminished.

The response of our young readers – and their parents and their teachers – to our invitation to submit original works of Purim-related art is deeply gratifying.

Each year we receive hundreds of drawings. Colours engage. Creativity soars. And the results reach very high.

The story of Purim is a launching pad to the unlimited, exploring flight of youthful imagination. And many of the imaginations do indeed take flight.

We received a rich variety of multi-material and multi-coloured works. Children from Kehila Jewish community Day School in Hamilton, for example, sent us their drawings as the "fillings" of large individual hamantaschen.

Some of the pictures we received were even three-dimensional.

Especially gratifying was the fact that we received entries from so wide a geographical bridge – Regina to Fredericton.

It is a treat and a privilege for The CJN to be able to showcase the artistry of so many youngsters. We regret only that we could not publish more of the drawings. We therefore say thank you to all of you who took the time to draw the images and to your parents or teachers who may have encouraged you to do so, and then, took the time to ensure we received them.

Happy Purim!

* * *

Perhaps in some of us, where it is necessary, the celebration of Purim this year, will help to ignite the pilot light of Jewish identity. If it does, and even if it does not, I draw readers' attention this month to two special books: The Birdsong and other stories by Meir Uri Gottesman, Targum/Feldheim Press, and the Margolin Edition Torah, also from Feldheim Publishers.

Rabbi Gottesman, renowned for his works of kiruv, of bringing individuals closer to their Judaism, is a fabled storyteller in the tradition of the 18th and 19th century eastern European Chassidim. He picks up their storytellers' cloak and wears it with the gentle dignity and love of fellow man that characterized these masters of two hundred years ago.

Birdsong is a collection of four of his tales including, of course, the one which gives the anthology its title. The four stories in the collection tell imaginative tales of achievement and sorrow, of laughter and tears, of raw emotion and tender caring. Each packs its own musar, its own moral, its distinctive teaching within Judaic culture and folklore that amuses even as it informs.

The stories are delightful, tightly written, and perfect for nighttime reading for adults or children.

The Hebrew in the Margolin Edition Torah is, of course, not what makes this version of the Chumash, the Five Books of Moses, different from the others. It is rather, the innovative English translation rendered by Rabbi Binyamin S. Moore.

Born in London, Rabbi Moore now resides in Jerusalem. He brings more than a decade of experience in publishing and almost two decades of scholarship to his work.

The Torah in translation, of course, is "lesser" than in its original language, for the words and the letters of the Hebrew form an entirety which can neither be diminished, supplemented, redefined, or recategorized.

But Rabbi Moore successfully brings a new dimension to his translation. He elevates even as he furrows deeper the English rendering of the Hebrew words by "integrating" the literal translation of the verses along with key explanations by Rashi of some of those same verses.

The result is an authoritative, fuller, more interesting English translation of the Chumash. The edition is elegantly bound and elegantly printed with clean, uncluttered English and Hebrew typefaces facing each other on opposite pages.

In addition to the Five Books, the Margolin Edition Torah also includes the full Shabbat prayer service from Minchah Friday to Motza'ei Shabbat, the five megillot, the Haftarot, 40 pages of explanatory notes and the calendar of tables for special readings in Israel and the Diasporah.

The Margolin Edition Torah is a welcome addition to the library of the many existing Torah editions.

Ontario day schools unite to pursue funding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Schnapps and l'chaims greeted the founding meeting last week of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS).

Toasts were raised to honour a milestone: an umbrella group that brings together, for the first time, all day schools in Ontario, ranging from Reform to chassidic yeshivot, to pursue public funding.

TORAH SCHOLARS: Greg Orelowitz of Torah Tots Pre-School carries a Sefer Torah into the shul during a Torah celebration held in conjunction with the class's unit on All About A Scribe.

Yisroel Janowski, the new president of the group, called the development "the miracle of every segment of our community coming together in achdut, in unity." The ultimate goal of the OAJDS is that "every Jewish child in Ontario should have access to a Jewish education."

Representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education looked on as the new group elected a board of directors and executive, and adopted a mandate.

Shirley Worth, past president of the board of Jewish education, hailed the group's formation as "a historic moment in our community."

The OAJDS was in the formative stages for nearly a year, partly in response to the grassroots and parents groups that sprang up following the United Nations finding in late 1999 that Ontario discriminates by funding Catholic schools and not other faith-based schools.

All 42 day schools and yeshivot in Ontario – in Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, Kitchener and London – are represented in the OAJDS. The executive consists of: Janowski (president); Frank Samuels of Hamilton (vice-president); David Posluns (treasurer); Georganne Burke (secretary); and Robert Samery (director-at-large). Samery is also president of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF).

Any one of the schools can withdraw from the group at any time.

Officials stressed the OAJDS will not lobby Queen's Park directly for funding, leaving that job to such established advocacy bodies as Congress, B'nai Brith and non-Jewish groups.

Rather, the group adopted a two-stage mandate. It will provide direction and advice to community advocacy and lobbying bodies in the pursuit of equal public funding for Jewish day schools, and act as direct liaison to negotiate with the province when such funding becomes available.

The OAJDS also adopted the following philosophical platform:

"The injustice of the current lack of equality in education funding in Ontario, and the desire to right that wrong through equal funding for all denominational schools is a significant issue for the Jewish community in its efforts to ensure that no Jewish child is denied a Jewish education because of the cost.

"Lobbying and advocacy initiatives in this regard have been undertaken over the years by different organizations and individuals. These efforts must continue until a successful resolution has been achieved. Notwithstanding these efforts, there exists a need for a co-ordinating advisory board to provide guidance to these lobbying groups, to ensure the needs of Ontario's Jewish day schools are met, and to ensure that a unified voice is presented by these lobbying groups to government on behalf of all Jewish day schools."

In his comments, Janowski, who headed the group's steering committee since last spring, said there is a "unique" window of opportunity now to press the government for funds.

Samery agreed, saying the community is "closer today than ever before" to securing public funds for day schools. The OAJDS "has every prospect of succeeding."

Many cabinet minister and backbench MPPs are on side, he said, adding that other faith and ethnic groups look to the Jewish community for leadership on the matter.

Simon Rosenblum of Canadian Jewish Congress suggested, as have two Tory MPPs in recent weeks, that the Jewish community alter its approach on the funding campaign, away from presenting it as an issue of discrimination, and toward portraying it as a matter of choice.

"The more effective argument is freedom of choice," Rosenblum said. "There's a lot of evidence that a considerable number of MPPs have been won over by that."

He also noted that $14.4 million in government funds have been begun to flow to private school students with special needs.

Although the community welcomes the money as possibly a first step toward funding curricula, "it wasn't what we thought would happen."

Jewish officials hoped the health services funds would be delivered to students with special education needs. Instead, the money was narrowed to students with medically defined special needs.

"We're going to have to be able to mount a political offensive to get all special needs kids funding," Rosenblum said.

In the coming months, the Ontario Tories will mount what they have termed a "visioning" exercise, consulting Ontarians on priorities. The results are expected to become part of the next Tory platform, and the Jewish community has been urged to take part in the process to press the case for funding.

Tiana Koffler Boyman looks ahead

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Tiana Koffler Boyman was approached to take over the helm as president of the Koffler Centre for the Arts, the timing seemed just right.

"I wanted to be a part of the centre," Koffler Boyman said in an interview, "but I wanted it to happen at the right time – when I could give the most of myself."

After several years of philanthropic and community work in other venues, she felt that "it was time to get involved and undertake a major project like this one."

Koffler Boyman spent the past four years on the centre's board learning as much as she could from Dorothy Shoichet, the past president of the centre.

"It was Dorothy who first approached me to join the board. Later, she asked if I would be interested in becoming president.

"Initially, I couldn't imagine agreeing because I didn't want Dorothy to leave," Koffler Boyman said. "Fortunately, she has remained on the board as chair."

Tiana Koffler Boyman

While "Dorothy has molded and guided the centre to its present state," Koffler Boyman is now hoping to be able to expand on the centre's vision.

Until now, the Koffler Centre (a department of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre) has successfully served the community through its various schools – music, dance, visual arts and drama – as well as through its many programs, Koffler Boyman said.

Currently, some of the centre's many established projects are the gallery, which exhibits up-and-coming and established Canadian Jewish artists all year round; the Jewish Book Fair which has had over 9,000 visitors through its doors to hear speakers and authors; and the Jewish Book Awards, which are presented in June and attract authors from all over the country.

"However, from here we want the Koffler Centre to move ahead and reach out in order to bring Jewish culture to the community at large.

"Its location in the north end of the city means that there are elements of Jewish learning and community outreach that this centre can serve," Koffler Boyman noted. "Being a vibrant Jewish organization means that our programs can also reach across cultures."

At this point, a lecture series, a concert series and master classes are being planned as ways to raise public awareness.

"What we hold as a model is the 92nd street Y in New York," she said. "They have managed to achieve tremendous programming and bring it into the community."

Koffler Boyman, the mother of four boys, is married to Marc Boyman, an independent film producer. She divides her time between parenting and philanthropic work.

"It's a busy life balancing work and family," she said. "My husband and I support our boys in all their activities – in their sports, music and academics. It is so important to never neglect family."

Her own parents, Murray and Marvelle Koffler, she said, did an excellent job influencing the direction of her life by not trying to influence the direction of her life.

"If they have affected my direction, they've done it in such a subtle way that it's been warmly received.

"My parents are so dynamic and so involved in the community that it has opened up so many doors of interesting people and dynamic organizations. Every day, just being part of the broader Koffler family has been an exciting adventure."

Tiana, who is one of five siblings, said that "each one of [us] has remained active in [our] own Jewish communities.

"We've chosen directions which have connected with our own personal lifestyles. For me, the projects that I have done have been those that my parents have had significant interest in."

Koffler Boyman, who attended Havergal College, Western University and the University of Toronto, focused her community time on more science-related organizations before her involvement at the centre for the arts.

She was involved in fund-raising for the Weizman Institute of Science and the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at the Mount Sinai Hospital, where she co-chaired the Henry's Tournament for Health.

"It's an all-women's golf tournament, with beginners and advanced players. It's a wonderful event. Everyone is out there having a great time and raising funds for breast cancer.

"Now, I look forward to the challenge of going forward and building on the strengths that we have here at the Koffler Centre for the Arts. Because we are so multi-dimensional, we can really offer so many different programs to the community."

Oberlander still in Canada despite court ruling

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The case involving former Nazi killing squad member Helmut Oberlander remains in limbo, one year after a Federal Court ruled that Oberlander lied to immigration authorities about his wartime activities.

The delay has angered Canadian Jewish Congress, which called on federal authorities to remove Oberlander as quickly as possible.

"There is no tenable explanation for the government's inaction in this matter," said Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen. "Oberlander was a member of a unit whose only function was to murder people. Anyone who helped in the functioning of this unit does not deserve to live in Canada and the fact that he continues to be here is an abomination."

Oberlander, an ethnic German who was born in the former Soviet Union, served as an interpreter in Einsatzkommando 10a, a mobile killing squad that followed German army units into the Soviet Union and gunned down Jews by the thousands.

Federal Court Judge Andrew MacKay ruled Oberlander served with the unit as an interpreter and had he been truthful when being questioned by immigration authorities, he would never have been admitted to Canada.

The judge's finding of fact opened the door for a denaturalization order stripping Oberlander of citizenship, followed by deportation.

The court's findings were followed by a storm of protest from the Kitchener-Waterloo area, where Oberlander, 77, has lived as a successful builder.

The German Canadian Congress rose to Oberlander's defence, arguing immigration procedures, which leave no room for an appeal from the judge's findings of fact, are inherently unfair. The congress stated it wished to address cabinet in a bid to ensure Oberlander remained in Canada while Oberlander's lawyers filed a 100-page brief with the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration, arguing against Oberlander's loss of citizenship.

Under Canadian immigration law, a Federal Court judge hears evidence to determine whether a suspect gained entry to Canada by fraud. If the judge finds that to be the case, the file is turned over to the minister of citizenship and immigration, who can bring the case before cabinet for an order-in-council stripping the suspect of citizenship.

Loss of citizenship is followed by a deportation hearing in which the minister seeks an order removing the suspect from Canada.

"The court's finding has cleared the way for the federal government to bring closure to his case," Ronen said. "It's is unconscionable that a full year has gone by and the minister of citizenship and immigration [Elinor Caplan] has yet to recommend to cabinet that Oberlander be denaturalized and deported."

Lynn Lovett, a spokesperson for the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said "in every case we try to put it through the process as quickly as possible. I'm not able to comment for the reasons for the delay."

Bar-Ilan's gender studies program is professor's dream come true

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Prof. Dafna Izraeli, the creation of Bar-Ilan University's interdisciplinary graduate program in gender studies – the first of its kind in Israel – is the culmination of a dream.

"Universities are infamous for wanting to preserve disciplinary lines; what we are doing is encouraging people to move beyond [these lines] and work together," she said on a recent visit to Toronto.

Izraeli, 63, who grew up in Montreal, will be speaking there on March 19 and in Toronto on March 21. She is a sociology professor and former chair of Bar-Ilan's sociology department, and now chairs the J.L. & Rachel Gewurz Centre for Women and Gender Studies, which was named after her mother.

Dafna Izraeli

Izraeli co-chaired the first interdisciplinary conference on women in 1981, which established women's studies as legitimate academic pursuit. She has also served as adviser on the status of women to the president of Bar-Ilan University, to the prime minister's commission on the status of women, and to the head of the Women's Corps of the IDF.

She is a founding member of the Israel Women's Network and was on its executive. In 1997, she assisted in establishing the Network's Centre for Policy on Women, and served as its first chair.

The program's first class began this past fall with 20 students – there is one man – three of whom are studying for a PhD. They will be studying such courses as gender and biology; gender, language and literature; the feminist challenge to Halachah; and gender and history.

"The students are taking their cumulative knowledge in their own field and subjecting it to a feminist critique. Gender is a focal concern. When one studies gender, one looks at it historically, psychologically and through sociology and literature," Izraeli said.

"With the Industrial Revolution, for example, came the concept of male earners. As a result, women lost their economic power and became dependent on men.

"This gives a different perspective to the revolution. What was great progress on one hand, had a negative impact on women on the other, because it defined housework as unpaid labour."

The developing high-tech industry in Israel, she said, is "women friendly and family hostile. It offers women fast promotions and high income, and they are faced with new opportunities in a seductive work environment.

"It makes makes managing family life difficult, however. Women work long hours, and when they are home, their mind is somewhere else. Work becomes central."

Gender studies was born out of the feminist movement's demand that things related to women should be studied, said Izraeli. "There is very little known about women in various fields. There is history, and there is herstory. Herstory is different."

Izraeli's own defining moment as a feminist came while she and her husband Dove, a professor at Tel Aviv University, were at University of California at Berkeley.

"Although we had gotten our bachelor's degrees at the same time, he was a tenured professor, and I was a post-doc. It never occurred to me to question it.

"Then I became active in the feminist movement. I had always thought that being female was not relevant, and I suddenly realized that many of the decisions I had made in my life were shaped by me being a woman. It was a very powerful moment, and I decided to devote my research to the topic," said Izraeli, who has three children, 15 grandchildren, and a great-grandchild on the way.

There is a feminist movement in Israel, she said, but there is not a strong, general organization.

"At the universities, there are many women's studies courses and a lot of female teachers. The higher you go in the hierarchy, however, the fewer women you see. About 35 to 40 percent of the lecturers are female, and less than eight percent of the full professors are women.

"At Bar-Ilan, though, we have the first generation of gender scholars, and I was the first woman in Israel to get tenure on the basis of my research on women. Bar-Ilan is a welcoming place, and it appreciates the study of women's issues." The new program, she said, is "very exciting. We've created something new and the students and teachers are enjoying it."

'And no one could stand against them'

People awoke Sunday morning to the bitter news that a suicide bomber had blasted away the lives of three individuals and injured nearly 70 others in Netanya, Israel. As of this writing, no group had yet claimed "credit" for this latest despicable, craven manifestation of hatred toward Jews. But there was no doubt who was responsible.

Murder of Jews is condoned, encouraged and even planned in the highest ranks of the Palestinian Authority. Thus, it hardly matters if the Netanya bomb was carried by a member of Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, the Tanzim or Fatah. They are all extremists, echoing the statement of the Hamas spokesperson who in detached, emotion-less fashion told the television interviewer last weekend that his organization would resort to any means to drive the Jews from Israel.

Indeed, the day before the bombing, on Saturday, Hamas declared it was preparing to relaunch a new campaign of suicide bombing attacks on Israelis. In a statement faxed to Reuters in Gaza, the organization announced that "more than 10 potential martyrs were ready to strike the Zionist depths with their bodies..."

The Netanya attack occurred the day following Shabbat Zachor, the Sabbath that precedes Purim, the Sabbath on which we are reminded of the duty to stand eternally and unalterably opposed to evil.

There can be no doubt that the modern embodiment of the evil that we, indeed, all individuals of conscience and decency, must resist, lies in the fanaticism that engages the suicide bomber, or in the cruelty that gloats over the possession and threatens the use of chemical and biological weaponry, or in the heartlessness that dispatches children to the front lines of violent confrontations.

The reminder, alas, was especially timely this year, and the celebration of Purim will be ever more poignant as a result.

In Megillat Esther, starting in Chapter 8, Verse 11, until Chapter 9, Verse 18, as the drama of the courageous rescue from Haman's treacherous plotting reaches its peak, there are five very precise references that point to the "coming together," to the "uniting," of the Jews in defence of their lives.

"The Jews gathered together in their cities, throughout the lands ruled by King Achashverosh to defend themselves against those who sought to do them harm and no one could stand against them..." (Our emphasis) (Ch. 9, v. 2)

Among the many, if hidden, lessons of the story of Purim, surely this is one the Jewish people must keep uppermost in our minds and in our hearts as we steel ourselves for the harm that the modern Hamans and the modern Amaleks will attempt to visit upon Israel.

Despite our differences, the Jewish people must put aside divisions; we must "gather together" – literally and metaphorically – in our respective communities, whether in Israel or in the Diaspora.

Only thus will they fail, who seek to do Israel harm.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, 2000 in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Pre-Holocaust materials sought

The Shtetl Foundation of Canada is seeking photographs, memorabilia, post cards, books in all eastern European languages, and personal accounts relating to lives in eastern Europe before World War II. These items will be displayed and exhibited at the Shtetl Castle Museum in Rishon Le-Zion, Israel.

The Castle will house the main historical centre, comprising an archive and library where scholars can pursue their research, as well as a museum of eastern European life and an art centre where people will be able to see a variety of attractions, including plays, concerts and films.

Upon request, original photos will be returned after being copied; all material will be acknowledged according to owners' wishes. Please call 416-616-5195 or e-mail sun18@idirect.com

Visit Israel

Lately on TV and in the news, you hear stories about how dangerous Israel is. It didn't seem that way at all to me. I went to Israel two weeks ago and I was not the least bit uncomfortable. I went for my bat mitzvah and I toured with a group in Tel Aviv. We went all over the country, including to the Western Wall and beside the Temple Mount.

On the last days of our tour, we stayed in Eilat, at a hotel that is a five-minute walk from Egypt, a 10 to 20-minute boat ride to Jordan and a 30-minute boat ride to Saudi Arabia, yet I felt safe. Just because the papers and the media say that Israel is dangerous, it doesn't mean it's entirely true.

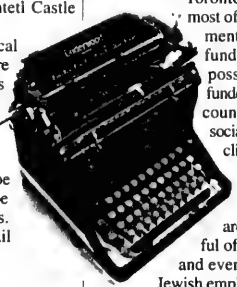
JVS responds

I am writing in response to the letter from the Toronto Board of Rabbis (CJN, Feb. 1). The letter expresses profound disappointment regarding the fact that "JVS will now require compensating time from its Jewish employees who choose to observe more than seven days of Jewish holy days and festivals and that JVS will continue to offer non-emergency programs of services on Shabbat and yom tov." The letter asks for clarification of JVS's position.

JVS has had as its guiding principle the concept of tzedakah or righteousness. Maimonides, the 13th-century Jewish philosopher, wrote that "the highest degree of righteousness is to give assistance to those who have fallen upon hard times by helping them to become self-reliant."

JVS was founded in 1947 to assist survivors of the Holocaust and Jewish men and women who were demobilized at the end of World War II to rebuild their lives in Canada. Since then, JVS has evolved into a broad-based community organization, helping people of all ages, races, faiths and nationalities.

The extremely innovative programs, developed by highly qualified staff, are funded by municipal, provincial and federal governments, the United Way of Greater Toronto and UJA FEDERATION, with most of the funding coming from government agencies. Virtually all current funders insist on ensuring the fullest possible accessibility for clients to funded services, along with stringent accountabilities. To acquire funding for social programs in the current economic climate demands a high level of competitiveness.



JVS's staff is as diverse as are the people we aim to serve, and we are, in our Jewish response, respectful of the religious observances of each and every staff member. Accordingly, no Jewish employees have been, nor will they be, required to work on Shabbat or yom tov.

We take great pride in our Jewish heritage, and recent events have prompted us to create a task force to examine and make recommendations relating to our Jewish identity.

Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto

Regarding Ben Lappin

Thank you for the obituary you published (CJN, Jan. 25), subsequent to the passing of my father, Prof. Ben Lappin.

I would like to set several things straight, as some of the details stated in the article were wrong: My father obtained his PhD in social work from University of Toronto and not McMaster University. He left the CJC in 1958, both to complete his PhD and to teach full time at U of T. By the time we made aliyah in 1970, he was a full professor and head of the community organization department at the faculty of social work. He did not found the school of social work at Bar-Ilan University; he did, however, establish the first department of community work in all of Israel. He was a pioneer theoretician in his field and a major innovator whose professional books and articles are considered classics.

Two and a half years ago, a number of his former students who today occupy top positions in community service in Israel created what they called The Lappin Group, intellectuals and practitioners who united in order to continue learning and acquiring wisdom from my father. They regarded him as a giant in his field. The group has decided to remain together and continue their study and application of his ideas.

He arrived in Canada in 1924 at the age of nine, and he saw himself (gratefully) as a Canadian Jew with a binding commitment to Israel.

Perspectives

The refugee claims the world ignores

By DONALD CARR
Special to The CJN

Palestinian-Arab refugees have loomed large in the abortive "peace negotiations," and in the media. How the original hapless and homeless came to that state has been debated by both those with and those without historical facts.

How did 550,000 to 700,000 Arabs in 1948, unwanted and unabsorbed in surrounding Arab countries that have the same religion, language, and culture – only Jordan offered them citizenship – become as many as five million, as claimed in recent days?

The answer to this jump in numbers lies in the double and triple counting by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), as well as in false registrations, concealments of deaths, a birthrate that now sees grandchildren among the tally and confusion over expulsions from places like Kuwait during and after the Gulf War.

[Photos Keren Hayesod/UIA]

The purpose of this article, however, is not to re-examine the causes of the present Palestinian-Arab refugee situation. Nor is it to engage in the "numbers game," or discuss in detail the non-existent "right of Palestinians to return" asserted by the Arab world and carelessly accepted as fact by the media and those ignorant of international law.

It is, rather, to reflect on and recall the plight of another group of refugees – greater in number than those original Palestinian Arabs who became refugees – who fled their ancestral homes in Arab lands as a result of persecution triggered by events surrounding the founding of the Jewish State. These are the forgotten Jewish refugees.

It is interesting that after there has been virtually no reference to them over five decades, their very tangible claims have finally found their way onto the agendas of the Israeli government and of Jewish organizations, such as World Jewish Congress and Keren Hayesod.

For years, organizations such as the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC) endeavoured to have the facts of their dispersion and their claims included in talks between Israel and Arab countries or the Palestinian Arabs. Even the multilateral committee on refugees, which emanated from the Madrid Conference and of which Canada serves as the chair, has spent no time examining this issue.

Israel's avoidance of the issue seems based upon the peculiar concern that if it were raised, Arabs would counter by inviting all Jews who fled to return to their countries of origin. Indeed, such cynical "invitations" have been issued by Libya and Iraq.

But raising the issue of Jewish refugees from Arab lands and their claims for compensation is not a ploy to counter the claims of Palestinian-Arabs. It is a very real and, as yet, unresolved matter.

The persecution of Jews in Arab countries goes back to the seventh century. As Dhimmis (protected infidels), Jews were subject to harsh, discriminatory decrees such as prohibitions against building houses higher than those of Muslims, riding horses, praying, mourning or burying their dead in a way that might be offensive to Muslims, drinking wine in public, bearing arms and the acceptance of their oath in a Muslim court.

It was not the Nazis who invented the wearing of a distinctive patch for Jews. As early as the ninth century, Jews were required to wear different coloured clothing, a rope instead of a belt, yellow patches, distinctive turbans or odd-coloured shoes.

Destruction and seizure of Jewish property, assaults and murder were common. Ransom was demanded and crippling taxes imposed. Any suggestion, therefore, that Arab oppression was brought about by political Zionism or the creation of the State of Israel is a myth.

Yet the attitude towards the Jews subsequent to the Balfour Declaration and at the time of the birth of Israel did change – for the worse. Intolerance and sporadic pogroms gave way to brutal, systematic persecution, particularly in Syria, Iraq, Egypt and Libya. Public executions were common.

Murder, torture and rape of Jews were condoned and even encouraged. Looting of shops, sacking of schools, synagogues and homes were the order of the day. There were hate campaigns in the media, often controlled and always encouraged by Arab governments.

With the Arab invasion of the new State of Israel, mass arrests, interrogation and beatings took place in Iraq, Egypt and Syria. Riots broke out in Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Yemen and Aden. Civil rights were suspended and it became practically impossible for professionals and businessmen to continue their livelihoods.

More than 850,000 Jews were compelled to flee the lands where their communities had existed for centuries, prior to the birth of Mohammed and the Muslim conquest.

Mordechai Ben Porat, a refugee from Iraq and now chair of both WOJAC and the Ministerial Committee on Refugees, said, "The landholdings that Jews were forced to abandon in Arab countries constituted three percent of all of the Arab world's vast territory. This is far more than the State of Israel and the administered territories."

The camp for new immigrants at Beit Lid in 1949.

Former Israeli cabinet minister Moshe Shahal, now chair of the World Presidium of the Organization of Jews from Arab Countries, said recently that the value of property owned by Jews who were expelled or left Arab countries between 1922 and 1982 is estimated at $30 billion US.

The Jewish population in Arab countries, estimated in 1948 at 856,000, is today less than a few thousand. Where did they go?

Israel was a natural refuge for most.

Some arrived there independently. Others were part of a massive rescue organized by local communities and Israeli authorities. The populations of Yemen and Iraq were airlifted to Israel between 1948 and 1951.

Others, like the remnants of the Syrian Jewry, were spirited out clandestinely between the 1970s and 1990s.

Some 586,000 Jews from Arab countries arrived in Israel between 1948 and 1972. The remainder found their way to France, England, the United States, South America, Mexico and Canada.

Those who arrived in Israel found it lacking in natural resources, poor and under attack by Arab neighbours. Most of the Jews living in Israel were of European and Ashkenazi origin; all they had in common with the refugees was religion and the will to survive. Language, tradition and ethnicity were different, unlike the Arab refugees who left Israel and found themselves in Arab countries.

Yet Israel did not turn to the UN or UNRWA. With the assistance of world Jewry, much was done to give Jewish refugees equal opportunity, resettlement and absorption. The problem was gigantic. Between 1948 and 1951, the population of the new state doubled.

Israel spent approximately $11 billion US in the immigration and absorption of Jews from Arab countries. The absorption and resettlement of the refugees was not an unqualified success. The slums and depressed areas of Israel today, the overcrowding and lack of housing and social problems stem from that time. The refugees and their offspring now comprise almost half the population of Israel. When taking into account immigration from non-Arab Middle Eastern countries, such as Iran and Turkey, the population of Jews from the Middle East and their descendants are the majority in Israel today.

In the exchange of population between Jews and Arabs in the Middle East since 1948, the Jewish side has suffered the heavier damage. The wealth abandoned by Jews in Arab lands surpasses many times the property left behind by Arabs in Israel. The social losses and the religious treasures and facilities which Jews were compelled to leave behind exceed that of the Palestinian Arabs.

Resolution 242 of the UN Security Council, which is the foundation-stone for settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict, includes the affirmation of "the necessity… for achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem." That wording was deliberate. It says "the refugee problem," not "the Arab refugee problem." Furthermore, the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt provides that "the Parties agree to establish a claims commission for the mutual settlement of all financial claims."

Thus, the key documents relating to the hoped-for peace in the Middle East make provision for the settlement of claims made by Jewish refugees from Arab countries and not only by Palestinian-Arab refugees.

Almost no international attention has been paid to the Jewish refugee problem. As a member of the Israel delegation to the UN in 1977, Mordechai Ben Porat spoke to the General Assembly about the rights of these refugees.

There was little response.

In the U.S.-Israel working paper on the Geneva Conference in 1977, a passage was devoted to the issue. It stated that "In any discussion of reparations for the refugees, Israel will raise the question of reparations for Jewish refugees from Arab lands and insist that all their claims be settled within the framework of the final peace agreement."

Little, if anything, has been done internationally or even among world Jewish organizations with respect to these Jewish claims. No Holocaust memorial program or Holocaust studies course tells the story of the death and pillage of the Jews in the Middle East.

Only a handful of dedicated workers have perpetuated the cause. Sir Martin Gilbert, the eminent Oxford University scholar, wrote a book in 1976, The Jews of Arab Lands, which told their history in the "language" of maps.

Malka Hiffel Shulewitz of Jerusalem, who was co-ordinator of the Israel Academic Committee for the Middle East, has also been an avid spokesperson. In 1999 she edited The Forgotten Millions, the most definitive single source on the subject, which includes essays from experts in the field.

The claims of Jewish refugees from Arab countries – absorbed as they were by Israel and other lands – are real and substantial. They demand recognition by the world, and satisfaction in whatever arrangements can be made with Palestinians or Arab nations.

X-rated

A few weeks ago, I happened to be in Las Vegas, Nevada. No, I was not there to enrich the slot machines or try my luck at poker. I happened to make the short trip because one of the six congregations in the city had invited me to be its scholar-in-residence. I mention this because on that weekend, Nevada was host to a new sport, and the reaction it engendered causes me to write this column.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I have on occasion written about the increasing violence in hockey, and I want to follow this observation with something that has now happened in the world of professional football. The game is violent by its very nature. Tackling is not for sissies and injuries are frequent. It is my understanding that the average duration of the professional player is no more than four years of activity.

But if that were not enough, something new has been added. A new league has been established, called XFL. The "X" usually stands for something not fit for young people or adults who detest vulgarities. I know my readers belong to the latter category.

Who plays for the new league? Obviously those players who could not make the top league and who, in addition, are willing to expose themselves to the type of tackling that in all too many instances will lead to injury. For certain protective rules of the existing league have been quashed – like the protection of the quarterback or of the player who signals a fair catch. I will not go into further detail, but the bottom line is simply this: The people who devised this new sport (if one can so call it) have introduced enough changes to allow for greater violence, and the very names of the teams that have joined the new league are an indication — San Francisco Demons, Las Vegas Outlaws, New York/New Jersey Hitmen and Xtreme.

All this would be just a little footnote not worth mentioning if it were not for the fact that XFL's television audience is reported to have been extraordinary large, over 10 percent of the total TV watchers that day.

Why do I call your attention to this new atrocity? Certainly not in order to attract you to the next show, but to warn everyone who disapproves of this latest TV offering not to tune in. Without enough voyeurs, the show will crumble. So do your part in not looking at it and, hopefully, in helping to get rid of the latest "X."

A system in need of change

The national unity government that Ariel Sharon never dreamt he could lead is currently being presented as a panacea for Israelis in troubled times. This may indeed be a recipe for mid-term political stability, it may help to attenuate world reaction to Sharon, and it may serve Shimon Peres' personal political interests. However, more importantly, it is evidence of the weakness of Israel's current electoral system.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Let's not forget how the ill-conceived system was first born. In the late '80s, widespread public frustration with Israel's extreme form of proportional representation led to various proposals for electoral reform. The most comprehensive of these was the proposal for a mixed constituency and proportional system following the German model, that maintained the characteristics of a parliamentary system – one ballot, in which the party with the plurality of seats forms a coalition government.

In and of themselves, coalition governments are not bad. They provide a form of checks and balances and allow for representation in government of a wide range of perspectives. Israel's system ultimately failed by maintaining a very low threshold of representation that (still) awards a Knesset seat for 1.5 percent of the popular vote. As Israel's two large parties gained parity in votes, coalitions became more difficult to form and small parties exercised power beyond all proportion.

When the comprehensive reform proposal failed to gain support, a group of Knesset members and academics proposed direct election of the prime minister, thereby splitting the vote into two ballots. Nothing else in the system was changed. Instead of strengthening the prime minister, the new system has had disastrous destabilizing results for Israeli democracy. Consider the following:

In a parliamentary system, former prime minister Ehud Barak was able to call a snap election for prime minister only. The very fragmented Knesset that led to his political demise remained intact, creating virtually the same challenges for his successor.

The new prime minister's party has only 19 out of 120 seats in the Knesset, and yet it is considered the governing party.

Israeli Arabs, 19 percent of the population, virtually stayed home in the last election. They did not want to vote for either candidate, and because they did not have to vote for a Knesset list, they could nevertheless feel that their protest would not affect their parliamentary representation.

The new system has aborted the terms of two prime ministers, has fragmented the Knesset, and has aggravated rather than contained existing trends in Israeli society towards sectarianism and divisiveness.

As Barak cast about for a political lifeline in his last desperate months, he negotiated a national unity government with Sharon who, in turn, was eager to shore up his position as leader of Likud. The deal was nixed in part by Likud pro-Netanyahu forces, who did not want Sharon to survive. Now, a national unity government is being formed in part to assure Sharon the kind of stability that will make it more difficult for Benjamin Netanyahu to quickly succeed him in the event of Sharon's political demise. The ironies are multiple, and almost bizarre.

Not surprisingly, many Israelis are questioning the direct ballot system. Israel is the only country in the world that has introduced a direct ballot into a parliamentary system, and it has done so at a time when only three of the stable democracies in the world have a presidential system. The parliamentary system, which has its own flaws, is the preferred model for the 21st century.

A courageous, far-sighted, but also self-interested move by Labour and Likud in a national unity government could be a joint commitment to electoral reform. In the past, Labour and Likud failed to raise the threshold of representation, for fear of the consequences in their relations with the small parties. Now, a decade later, both parties have been decimated in the Knesset by the new, substitute system. They could make a significant contribution to Israeli democracy by returning to a single-ballot system with a higher threshold of representation. This could transform the political landscape, and it might blunt the rough edges of the deep divisions in that society. The short-term advantages of a national unity government should not obscure the deeper need for reform.

The Clinton pardons: Jews in news again

As of this writing, it seems likely that the U.S. Congress will hold hearings to investigate some of former president Bill Clinton's pardons. And once again, Jews are in the news.

For many in the Jewish community, the hearings dealing with swindler Marc Rich and his generous ex-wife Denise will likely occupy centre stage. They became high profile Jews while on the lam in Switzerland, donating large sums to Israeli and Jewish causes. Marc Rich got character references from dozens of Jewish and Israeli luminaries, from Ehud Barak to Rabbi Yitz Greenberg.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

But more troubling to me are the commutations of the sentences given to the four chassidic leaders of the New Square community in Rockland county, N.Y. The four had been convicted of swindling the U.S. government out of tens of millions of dollars in grants to a fictitious school. They were convicted on 21 charges, including conspiracy, mail fraud, embezzlement and money laundering.

The four and their supporters did not deny the charges, but claimed rather that the matter was not all that serious since they did not pocket the money personally, but distributed it to other chassidic institutions and residents of their community. This type of "Reuven Hood" rationalization was also used in the recent case of a Chassid from the Tash community outside Montreal, who fraudulently obtained millions of dollars for his group and fled to Israel.

Assume for a moment that there was a quid pro quo in the Clinton pardon of the four Chassidim. This community voted en bloc for Hillary Clinton, 1,400 to 12, and in gratitude, the president – along with his wife – met with leaders of the community and later reduced their sentences significantly. Other nearby chassidic communities voted in lopsided fashion for Rick Lazio, Hillary's Republican opponent.

This type of horsetrading is actually not that shocking. It is, in fact, the stuff of electoral democracy – reward your friends and punish your enemies – not only in the United States, but in many liberal democracies. Candidates and parties pander to constituencies, be these farmers, pro-choice or pro-life movements, labour unions, business groups or ethnic groups, in exchange for electoral support. What is unusual in the chassidic case is the amazing ability of the rebbes to deliver the votes. Leaders of other interest groups must be really jealous.

I find most troubling the original crime itself, and the attitudes it reflects. The strong sense among many Jews, both Orthodox and non-Orthodox, is that non-Jews and the state itself represent the "other."

Some religious Jews may well feel that other Jews, as well as gentiles, are less worthy, and thus their rights and interests less deserving of respect. Laws are a nuisance, to be circumvented whenever possible. There is no sense of a common, civic responsibility. It is therefore perfectly OK to break laws if the benefits are used to further the cause of Torah and the interests of the particular religious group. So fraud is not really stealing, but rather re-allocating resources in a more fitting manner.

But this attitude can be found among less religious and secular Jews as well. We Jews have a strong tribal streak, hence the term MOT, or member of the tribe. This kind of in-group solidarity is clearly a strength of Jewish life and community. It is also a legacy of centuries of anti-Semitism. But at the same time it can breed an arrogant disdain for all those not in the tribe. This sentiment is, of course, found in many other minority groups as well.

It is troubling for Jews – at least for me – when their religious or communal leaders are involved in major frauds against the government. The good news is that there was no public rallying in support of these four Chassidim by the organized Jewish community, as has been the case for Jonathan Pollard. While the Pollard sentence was clearly excessive, and indeed vindictive, this does not seem to me apparent in the case of the four Chassidim.

Perhaps Clinton figured that since he would not intervene in the Pollard case, he would move on the Rich and chassidic cases as a farewell sop to the Jews who supported first himself, and now his wife. If so, thanks for nothing.

The Kirshner File

Robert Kaplan writes about a troubled world

Like the proverbial wandering Jew, American reporter Robert Kaplan roams far and wide, scouring the globe for paradigmatic stories to illuminate dark corners torn by ethnic violence, wracked by dictatorship, ravaged by environmental deprivation and threatened by demographic timebombs.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In trenchant magazine essays and in best-selling books, Kaplan, a former soldier in the Israeli army, grapples with difficult issues whose resolution could well define the shape of the 21st century.

Kaplan, whose travels have taken him to some 80 countries since 1972, brings a crystalline-hard sensibility to his craft. Reading him, one cannot but conclude that the universe is hopelessly divided by residual cultural and religious differences and that bloodshed rather than brotherhood is history's norm.

In his latest book, Eastward To Tartary: Travels in the Balkans, the Middle East and the Caucasus (Random House), Kaplan focuses on a region swimming in 70 percent of the world's proven oil reserves and more than 40 percent of its natural gas supplies. Kaplan, in this deftly-written and erudite volume, describes his picaresque odyssey from Hungary to Central Asia – where the legacies of the Byzantine, Persian and Ottoman empires overlap – and his intriguing meetings with intellectuals, politicians, generals and warlords.

Kaplan, in appearance, does not conform to the hackneyed romantic image of a dashing foreign correspondent. A small, compact, polite man of 48 with a shock of smooth black hair and an unwrinkled face, he resembles nothing less than an unprepossessing accountant as he settles into a chair for an interview at his publisher's office.

A freelancer whose readership is known to include President Bill Clinton, he launched his journalistic career in, of all places, Vermont. After graduating from the University of Connecticut, where he had a sports scholarship, he landed at The Rutland Daily Herald, circulation 28,000, as a general news reporter.

Frustrated by his none too exotic assignments, he applied for a job on a metropolitan daily, but was rejected. Facing a bleak future, Kapan bought a one-way ticket to Europe after receiving a rare East German visa. So in 1972, at the height of the Cold War, he went off to explore and write about Soviet-dominated countries, like East Germany, that scarcely interested Western newspaper editors.

Settling in Israel in 1976 as a new immigrant, he joined the Israeli army in 1980. "I had always wanted to serve in the military, but because of the Vietnam war, I was discouraged from volunteering for the American army," he explained. As an Israeli soldier, Kaplan saw no combat. "I was on the West Bank, searching cars for bombs."

He left Israel in 1981. "I didn't want to spend my life among only Jews. It would have been too constrictive. I felt claustrophobic. I discovered I was an American in Israel."

Kaplan moved to Greece, and from his base in Athens as a stringer for the Cox newspaper chain, he covered the Balkans, the Middle East and the Horn of Africa. In reporting the Iran-Iraq War – the bloodiest of the modern Mideast – he filed stories about Saddam Hussein when he was still a relatively unknown figure in the West.

Kaplan, who lives in western Massachusetts with his second wife and son, broke into the pages of The New Republic in 1984 and of The Atlantic Monthly in 1985. Around this time, he wrote his first book, a firsthand account of the war in Eritrea, Surrender or Starve: The Wars Behind the Famine.

Since then, he has produced eight books, several of which grew out of Atlantic Monthly articles. Soldiers of God: With the Mujahidin in Afghanistan turns on the Islamic fundamentalist guerrillas who drove the Soviet army out of that remote nation straddling the Middle East and Central Asia. From 1987 to 1989, Kaplan was in Afghanistan five times, and his being Jewish never posed a problem. "It really wasn't an issue. I always tell people I'm Jewish. It makes for good conversation."

Kaplan jumped into the major leagues in 1993 with the publication of Balkan Ghosts: A Journey Through History. Critics hailed it as a classic of travel writing and Amazon.com called it one of the best travel books of any era. Bill Clinton was also impressed: It reportedly influenced his Balkans policy. It's clear that Kaplan is fascinated by the Balkans. "It's where events hundreds of years old are real," he mused.

After Balkan Ghosts, he churned out The Arabists: The Romance of an American Elite, a blistering analysis of that fabled corps of American diplomats who cut their teeth in Arab states and tried to mould U.S. policy in the Middle East.

The Ends of the Earth: A Journey at the Dawn of the 21st Century, Kaplan's subsequent book, was a grim and pessimistic look at what the future probably held in store.

Warming to this theme in The Coming Anarchy: Shattering the Dreams of the Post Cold War, he observed: "West Africa is becoming the symbol of worldwide demographic, environmental and societal stress... West Africa provides an appropriate introduction to the issues, often extremely unpleasant to discuss, that will soon confront our civilization."

Choosing Sierra Leone as a microcosm of West Africa's ills, Kaplan claimed it represented "the withering away of central governments, the rise of tribal and regional domains, the unchecked spread of disease, and the growing pervasiveness of war." West Africa's fate, he predicted, was a bellwether of most of the world's future.

Robert Kaplan

Kaplan was just as pessimistic about the Balkans and the Middle East.

Speculating that the Balkans – the flashpoint of World War I – could yet be a powder keg for cultural war between Orthodox Christianity and Islam, he speculated that "a wave of Islam" would engulf overpopulated secular Arab states and render them ungovernable.

As for Israel, Kaplan offered this chilling prognostication: "Whatever the outcome of the peace process, Israel is destined to be a Jewish ethnic fortress amid a vast and volatile realm of Islam."

Nor did he spare Canada, foreseeing its "peaceful dissolution."

In Eastward To Tartary, which took two and a half years to research and write, Kaplan delves into an unsettled strategic area that, in his mind, has become an East-West fault line. "What the Balkans were to the 1990s, the Caspian region might be to the first decade of the new century: an explosive region that draws in the Great Powers."

Venturing forth from the plains of Hungary to the deserts of Turkmenistan, he visited, among other destinations, Turkey, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan and Israel. Kaplan, in his usual fashion, travelled alone. "Loneliness forces you to meet new people and confront new realities," he told me.

As always, he scoured the landscape for the "dirty little secrets" that, he holds, unlock the key to a country and enable him to portray it with truthfulness and cinematic flourish.

In Istanbul, he learned that the Arabs, still resentful of the Ottoman colonial past, distrust Turkey, that Turks share with Israelis a sense of being outsiders, and that Turkey regards its alliance with Israel as permanent.

Slipping into Syria, which reminded him of the dilapidated east bloc before the fall of communism in Europe, Kaplan encountered a nation torn by rival religious and tribal interests, scarred by the absence of democracy and a corresponding dissident class, and suffocated by a cult of personality revolving around Hafez al-Assad, the late Syrian president. Kaplan would not be surprised if Syria, along with Iraq, disintegrates.

In Lebanon, a state he describes as "a mere assemblage of feuding personalities," he met the enigmatic Druze leader Walid Jumblatt at his mountain redoubt. Kaplan's description of his host is telling.

He found a disquieting gap between rich and poor in Jordan, yet the roads of Amman were crammed with more imported high-priced cars than all of Israel.

In Israel, a country he knows like the back of his hand, Kaplan noted that its military reserve system has declined and that the number of religious army officers has significantly increased. Examining Israeli Orthodox Judaism, Kaplan wrote that it has not responded to "the challenge of modernity," and remains inextricably associated with the blood-and-soil ideology of West Bank settlers.

Having written Eastward To Tartary before the latest Palestinian uprising, Kaplan claims that the outcome of Israel's peace talks with the Palestinians is predictable. What does he mean? A Palestinian state will eventually emerge from the rubble of the current chaos.

Similarly, Kaplan is of the opinion that Israel will have to relinquish the West Bank, if only because the Israeli army "can't win an urban war there." Coming from someone like Kaplan, these are indeed prophetic words to ponder.

Jewish Life

Heroes or villains

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Purim has come again. We all know of Esther and Mordechai, the Jewish heroes, and Haman, the Persian villain. Megillat Esther has told us that we should give gifts of food to each other and presents to the poor. Clearly it is telling us to bond together internally by sharing our food and securing the vulnerable members of our community. Yet are these not ideals that should be present at all times? Why the emphasis at Purim?

The rabbis of the Talmud outline various other necessities for our celebration at Purim. One of the most unusual components is the requirement to drink alcohol until we can no longer tell the difference between "Blessed is Mordechai" and "Cursed is Haman." Interestingly, we are not told the amount of alcohol we must consume; rather we are told the end result. While I might only consume two glasses to reach this state of intoxication, my friend might need to consume two bottles. The measure of success is not in the amount, but in the outcome.

But the outcome itself is surprising. We must be so drunk as to no longer distinguish between the hero and the villain. It is surprising, considering that we usually strive to identify the heroes and villains in our lives, and that it is only good sense to do this. Yet the anomaly does not lie in the rabbinic statement, since the idea appears in the Megillah itself.

Haman and Mordechai often change places in the Megillah. To name a few examples, Haman gets the promotion Mordechai should have gotten; Mordechai rides on the royal horse that Haman believed was his honour; Haman is hanged on the gallows meant for Mordechai; and Mordechai gets the royal seal previously handed over to Haman.

As the incidents of transference continue throughout the text, the Megillah itself has already begun to confuse the reader. All these unusual pieces come together and lead us to ask, "Why?"

The answer can be found in the opening of the text. It is a story of an empire that spans 127 provinces. It is a story of exile. Esther, Mordechai, all the Jews of Persia are living in exile and so the text will describe their reality. In exile, the clear lines of definition begin to blur. Haman is the central political figure though Mordechai also enters the political realm. Once the text is dealing with the politics of exile, more confusion sets in.

We are all aware that the political heroes of today can easily back out of their promises and become the villains of tomorrow. When living in exile, people have no assurance of security and no one clear figure to completely trust.

Mordechai and Esther emerge as the heroes because they have learned to play the system, not because they are fooled into trusting it. They come to understand that trust belongs with God alone – in the face of confusion God remains the Absolute. They emphasize the strength of the community as the focus. Don't trust the external, but build the internal.

The rabbis have heard the message of the text. The rabbis are living in exile; they are not fooling themselves about the reality of their surroundings. Mordechai and Esther wrote the Megillah as a letter to the Jewish people, to us, the Jews of exile. When you are a Jew living in a non-Jewish land and playing the political game, do not trust your identification of the heroes and the villains.

On Purim, ponder the reality of exile, take another drink and remember that today's political promises are tomorrow's harsh disappointments.

Iraqi confiscation of Jewish assets, 50 years ago

By SASSON MAYER

Guest Voice

It is not only the tug of the memories of that dreadful day, 50 years ago, March 10, that drives me now to write about it, but also the fact that the attempt to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a currently recurring topic.

On May 15, 1948, when David Ben-Gurion proclaimed the founding of the new State of Israel, the government of Iraq declared a series of martial laws which harshly affected the majority of us in the Jewish community there. Then, at the beginning of March 1950, the Iraqi government introduced a law "permitting" us to register within one year to leave the country provided we relinquish our citizenship.

This move by the government was received with much enthusiasm in Iraq. What began as an irrational primal scream of rage in reaction to the creation of Israel gradually developed into something rational and sophisticated; that is, a complete "liberation" strategy for Iraq's Jews, who started registering and leaving for Israel but at a very slow pace. After more than 10 months, only 23,000 had left out of the more than 86,000 who had applied. But after a campaign of intimidation that included bomb-throwing, the number soon accelerated. Some weeks before the March deadline, about 30,000 more Jews signed up for departure, the total reaching over 103,000.

The secret emissary of Israel in Baghdad, Mordechai Ben Porat, wanted to deal with the question of the Iraqi Jews' huge assets, estimated then to be worth $450 million (US). On March 6, 1950, Ben Porat suggested to his bosses at the Mossad Aliyah B in Israel that an exchange of houses be made between the departing Iraqi Jews and the Palestinian refugees. Yet on the 10th of March, the Mossad was told by the Israeli ministry of finance (who had been made aware of Ben Porat's suggestion by the Mossad) that Ben Porat should not promise any compensation to Jews leaving houses in Iraq.

Only one day after the registration deadline passed, the Iraqi parliament convened in secret session; the five Jewish members of parliament were not allowed to attend. Prime Minister Nuri Al-Said presented Bill No. 5 of 1951, which froze the assets of all the Jews who had registered to leave. The bill became law. Many questions remain to this day regarding the decision by the government of Iraq to let their Jews go while confiscating Jewish property.

Meanwhile, the law enabling us to leave was treated by us as a salvation; the knowledge that we were leaving for Israel created a festival-like atmosphere. But we did not realize the scope of the new law until the next Sunday morning when the majority of us found out that our houses, stores, warehouses, bank accounts, cars – everything that we owned – no longer belonged to us. All each person owned was one suitcase full of clothes.

Israel wanted Iraqi Jews to come to their country. It received the majority of them not as the entrepreneurs or business people we were, but as poor and broken. At the same time, Palestinain refugees were demanding the right to return to their former homes.

On the 19th of March, Moshe Sharet, the foreign minister of Israel, declared in the Knesset, "By expropriating the assets of tens of thousands of Jews, the Iraqi government had incurred a debt to the state of Israel." With this, Israel became de facto, spokesman for, and beneficiary of, the Jewish assets estimated in value at $450 million (US).

I believe the Iraqi Jews today have forgotten the assets that their parents and grandparents left behind and are not counting on them in any shape or form. Nevertheless, it is our duty to let the world know of this confiscated property, so that Israel can rightly claim entitlement in its discussions regarding Palestinian claims to compensation.

Purim fun, games and food

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, Purim fun, games and food from the Internet, as the happiest holiday is practically here.

Could anything be more appropriate than a Hangman game in which you hang Haman? That's what Dr. Nurit Reshef has dreamed up in her Purim Games section [www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/purim/purimindex.html]. There is a huge assortment of games here including word search and a game in which you can smash that villain. After you've let it out on Haman, you can print out the Hebrew crossword puzzles and a story in Hebrew about charity where you are challenged to write the ending.

If you want to have the most expensive gragger on the block, go to the gragger link at the Celebrate with Joi Purim Site and click away [www.joi.org/celebrate/purim/]. You will hear a genuine rattling noise, but your computer may be a bit heavy to schlep to shul for the Megillah reading.

If you want a gragger that's a bit more portable, try your hand at building the one at Purim on the Net [www.holidays.net/purim/gragger.html]. Follow the instructions, and Purim night, take your home-made gragger to shul for a spin.

Your computer can help your kids brush up on some of the basic Purim vocabulary in Hebrew. And you won't even need to install Hebrew fonts [www.zigzagworld.com/hebrewforme/]. Zigzagworld has a lovely little game which lets you build a mask or crown on your desktop while teaching words in Hebrew [www.zigzagworld.com/mask/]. (Please be patient. These games take quite a while to load.)

The Aish HaTorah site has a large selection of activities geared toward Kids and their Parents [www.aish.com/holidays/purim/]. Jewish Heroes is a series of three workshops designed to stimulate discussion about heroes and heroines. And if you're a mom or dad who doesn't mind letting your kids turn your house upside-down for a bit of fun and education, then take a look at the detailed instructions for the Purim Scavenger Hunt. By the time your kids have scoured your house for the 15 clues, they will have learned a great deal about the holiday – without even realizing it.

One highlight of a children's Purim celebration is the Purim spiel or play. Valdosta Hebrew Congregation in Georgia have put their effort online if you'd like to use it as your inspiration [www.akhlah.com/holidays/purim/purim.asp]. And if you would like to include some of the classic Purim songs in your play, you can listen to selections of Ani Purim, Chag Purim and Shoshanat Yaacov online [www.emusic.com/s=505593987f942a09aed;h=407;/albums/12386].

Nothing can beat coming home to a doorstep full of mishloach manot. Almost as much fun is preparing the goodies that you'll be sending out – especially the hamantaschen. Sure, you can help your kids prepare the old standbys like prune and poppy seed [www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=PURIM].

But why not be daring and go for Cream Cheese or Chocolate-Peanut Butter [www.jewish-food.org/recipes/hamindex.htm]. (They will probably want to pass on the beef and onion filled hamantaschen [dinnercoop.cs.cmu.edu/dinnercoop/Recipes/jody/FlayshigeHamantaschen.html].)

D. Biskin has written a charming memoir about the day she and her daughters stumbled upon the very best ingredient of all for their hamantaschen [www.jewish-holiday.com/hamantash.html].

"I suggested we use the traditional prune and poppy fillings, but Rachel and Jessica crinkled up their noses… I then hit on it: 'How about chocolate?'… Hours later, piles of hamantaschen were strewn around the kitchen, some sticky with filling that leaked out the sides, some slightly burned and others just funny looking. I felt a sense of pride. My girls and I were actually doing a mitzvah together. Our results certainly were not esthetically or gastronomically perfect, but it came from the heart… I now realize that the flavour of the fruit or type of jam filling is irrelevant. The best hamantaschen in the world are those filled with love."

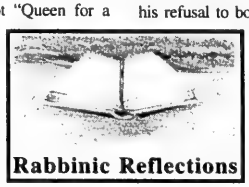
Purim: more than a fairy tale

By RABBI MARTIN J. BERMAN

The story of Purim and its cast of characters found in Megillat Esther are well known to everyone: The bumbling king Achashverosh has a beauty contest, which is won by the beautiful Esther, who then becomes not "Queen for a Day," but queen for life – if she survives Haman. Haman hates the Jews, especially Mordechai, and tries to destroy them. Esther risks her life to save the Jewish people from destruction.



The story is told in the manner of a fairy tale. The villains are all totally villainous and the heroes are totally heroic. Or are they?

Haman, for example, certainly does not care that thousands upon thousands of innocent men, women and children will die in his scheme to seek revenge. He is clearly painted in black and white terms. But how do we understand the role of Achashverosh? Is he merely a drunk who is tricked into evil by Haman? Is he simply uncaring about the well-being of his subjects? Does his indifference to slaughter make him just as guilty of the act as the one who does it?

And what about Mordechai? Mordechai may be one of the story's heroes, but doesn't he provoke the entire murderous scheme of Haman by his refusal to bow down to him? Jews bowed down to rulers. Why couldn't he bow? Was his family pride at work? Was the problem that Haman was a descendant of Agag the Amalekite, and Mordechai a descendant of King Saul who defeated Amalek? Was that reason enough to risk his enmity by refusing to honour him with a bow?

Our sages were bothered by this question as well. That is why the Midrash says that Haman wore an idol around his neck. Mordechai was not too proud to bow to Haman – he was a pious Jew who would not bow to an idol. But without the elaboration of the Midrash, we are left to ask about the wisdom of Mordechai's behaviour. How could he endanger all of Israel?

Finally, there is Esther. How could she submit to being taken to the palace? Why didn't she try to escape from the hands of those who wanted to take her there? When Mordechai turns to her for help, she doesn't volunteer. Only after Mordechai tells her that perhaps Israel will be saved but that she and her entire family will die (doesn't that include Mordechai?), only then is she prepared to face the king.

A careful reading, then, makes it clear that the characters of Megillat Esther act like real human beings. They are complex, with good, bad and ambiguous qualities. You don't have to be filled with evil to be a villain; you can be evil even if you are like the buffoonish Achashverosh. Inaction and not caring are sometimes just as bad as pulling the trigger.

Likewise, a hero is not someone who is perfect or without a flaw. Not all of a hero's actions are heroic; some may be ill-advised or dangerous. Yet, when faced by threats, the heroes overcome their shortcomings to persevere and win the battle. As is the case throughout the Bible, the heroes here are just like you and me. The most important message of their success is that we can all rise to the occasion if we allow ourselves to do so.

Rabbi Berman is the spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, Ont.

Some obstacles to Mideast peace can be overcome, says professor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Can there be true peace between Israelis and Palestinians? Not if the Palestinians continue to demand the right of return to homes they lost 52 years ago, according to the recently announced winner of the Israeli prize in Jewish Thought.

That "if" is crucial in answering the question of whether peace can be reached, as outlined in a dinner lecture last week by Aviezer Ravitzky, professor of Jewish Philosophy and chair of the department of Jewish Thought at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation at an event co-sponsored by the synagogue and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Ravitzky – who gave four other lectures as part of Beth Tzedec's Ralph and Roslyn Halbert lecture series – explained that the possibility of peace hinges on what the obstacles are.

Aviezer Ravitzky

A modern Orthodox member of the Zionist left, Ravitzky explained that agreeing to the Palestinian right of return would mean nothing less than "a destruction of the State of Israel, from three points of view – past, present and future."

With respect to the past, he said, it would mean agreeing to the "idea that the State of Israel was conceived and born in sin.

"I believe that Zionism has some sins in its history, and some in 1948," Ravitzky said, but to say we accept the right of return means we expelled all of them by force, raising the issue of the distinction between admitting to some sins versus being "born in sin."

Some Arabs were forced to leave, and Israel can make amends by helping Palestinians rebuild their own state, he noted.

Moving from past to present, Ravitzky raised the question of who exactly would return. "Those who are making money will not come back," he said. "Those who hate us very much will come back. It's a [time] bomb within Israel."

And as far as the future is concerned, he continued, agreeing to Palestinian right of return would not mean ending the conflict. "If we give up so much, we want to know the conflict will come to an end."

Ravitzky is not completely without hope. Perhaps, he speculated, the major obstacles have to do with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's transition from "a historical hero" to president of "a poor, corrupt state with so many problems," or with Arafat's lack of control of his people and a fear of being killed if he agrees to certain concessions.

Such obstacles are not immutable, Ravitzky believes. "If the principle of the right of return is the obstacle, it will be there 10 or 20 years from now. If it's a problem of [Arafat's] control over his people, it may be changed in his lifetime, or after his lifetime."

Ravitzky also noted the importance of defining what is meant by "true peace."

If it means beating swords into plowshares, as described in the words of the prophets, he doesn't believe it will happen, at least not in his lifetime.

But if the concept denotes the type of peace that exists between Israel and Egypt – "it means we don't kill each other" – then "perhaps hypothetically" it can be achieved, he said.

First, however, obstacles such as mutual fear and lack of trust must be overcome.

Reflecting on the evacuation of Yamit after the first Camp David accord, Ravitzky said that while destroying Jewish settlements in the land of Israel is "a tragedy," that must be weighed against "preventing real mourning of so many mothers and children and wives in the future."

"The second most difficult question" concerns the Temple Mount, according to Ravitzky, who believes it can and should be solved by mutual compromise.

"I don't want it to be controlled by any political power, including [outgoing Israeli Prime Minister Ehud] Barak or [newly elected PM Ariel] Sharon." Rather, he sees the site as "the one place in the world which [would] be owned by everybody, namely by nobody."

Ravitzky said he "must believe that a solution will be found" that will result in peace. "Because sometimes prophecies fulfil themselves."

Web site decision

Lawyer Mark Freiman, representing the CHRC, reviewed Irene Zundel's evidence linking her ex-husband to the Web site, pointing out she testified Zundel sent Rimland $3,000 a month to operate the site and that he edited its content.

Freiman parsed the language on the Web site, arguing "the entirety of the Zundelsite is dedicated to the perpetuation of negative stereotypes, attacking [with] epithets an entire people." The result would be to expose Jews to hatred or contempt, he added.

Freiman argued a Supreme Court of Canada decision in a case involving John Ross Taylor is applicable to the Zundel case. In the earlier case, the High Court ruled Section 13(1) applied to hate messages available on a telephone answering machine. Applying that rationale, he argued "the purpose of Parliament is to prevent functionally what the answering machine was in Taylor [case], the [repeated] communication of hatred or contempt..."

CHRC lawyer Eddie Taylor said although Zundel is no longer present in Canada, a cease and desist order by the tribunal would have the force of a court order. Zundel could be arrested for contempt should he return to Canada without complying with it, Taylor added. The tribunal's decision will also set a precedent that could be applied immediately in an upcoming Vancouver case that involves the promotion of hatred on the basis of sexual orientation, he said.

Congress spokesperson Len Rudner said a decision against the Zundelsite could lead Canadian Internet service providers to drop problematic sites."What is important is that the Internet is not a free for all without any rules," he said.

A ruling in favour of Zundel "would have serious implications on human rights" said B'nai Brith spokesperson Karen Mock. "It behooves Canadians to take action against this kind of hatred."

Fromm told a media scrum the case was an "attempt to grab control of the Internet by the federal government.

"We're trying to protect the Internet and protect maximum freedom of speech in Canada against the goose-steppers who want to take us back to the Inquisition," said Fromm, who was fired from his job as a teacher because of his involvement in white supremacist events.

Financial disclosure for self-employed spouses

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

When commencing negotiations on marital separation or when having to prepare for Court proceedings, it is mandatory that both spouses (married or not) give each other full and complete financial disclosure about themselves. If someone "hides" assets or income or if such disclosure is not exchanged, then the legal validity of the agreement or Court order that "resolves" the dispute could be held in question and even overturned by another Court.

Moreover, if one's lies are discovered during negotiations or a Court proceeding, then one's credibility suffers. In Court, when this happens, the liar often suffers huge financial consequences. Judges severely frown on such conduct and then tend to disbelieve what the liar maintains, not only about the facts uncovered, but also about unrelated factual matters. If you've lied about one aspect of your income, the Judge may then conclude that you are probably lying about everything else, even if you're not. Similarly, the Judge will tend to agree with much of what your spouse is requesting on financial issues if your failure to disclose is uncovered.

The consequences of lying

This is no joke. I have seen even a small lie lead to devastating consequences: support orders that are much higher than they normally would have been, and property splits that would normally be considered completely unfair. There are people who have literally committed suicide over Court orders arising from such mistakes.

In Ontario such financial disclosure is made on a particular form used by the Courts, even if spouses have no intention of resolving their dispute through litigation. These forms divide the information into two parts: (a) Property and (b) Income / Expenditures. In addition, each spouse must attach his or her tax returns for the past three years and Notices of Assessment received from the Federal government. If one of the spouses is self-employed, he or she is also expected to attach financial statements for the companies that generate his or her income.

Where does the onus of proof really lie?

The law is supposed to demand that if a spouse wants to prove that the self-employed partner is lying about financial disclosure, then he must prove it, as opposed to the self-employed spouse disproving it. However, with the way law is actually practiced and applied in the Courts, I wonder whether it is really the opposite: if one of the spouses is self-employed, it is up to him to prove that he is not lying about everything in his statement. In my opinion, there is almost a presumption that the affairs of a self-employed spouse must be carefully scrutinized.

I think a lawyer could be considered negligent if he fails to ask a number of probing questions in certain situations, or at least advise his client that such investigations should be made. Here are a few facts —"tricks of the trade", tips and "talking points" about some of the nuances in completing and relying on such financial disclosure forms.

The spouse who is not self-employed wants to investigate the following (this list is far from being complete).

1. Is there hidden cash income collected "under the table" or inflated "retained earnings" in the company beyond its true financial and financing needs? In one case, a forensic accountant showed that a dentist was understating his income because the amount of money he spent yearly on dental supplies for his office was well in excess of what was needed to generate the low income he was supposedly generating;
2. Is there "double accounting" where the self-employed spouse claims an "expense" (such as a car rental) under his personal expenditures even though the company's financial statement may show that it, and not the individual, is paying for the same expenditure?;
3. Do credit card statements & chits, bank statements and cancelled cheques going back three years that show expenditures demonstrate a lifestyle well beyond one's supposed income from all sources? If one claims a gross income of $60,000 yearly but spends $110,000 without increasing his debts, he could have a serious credibility problem. (If these documents are lost, then copies can almost always be retrieved from the financial institution for a fee.)
4. Do old applications for credit, such as credit cards, house/apartment rentals, car leasing etc., show a stated income in excess of what is being declared? Some people tend to exaggerate their income on these applications and then understate it in their family law financial disclosure. I usually ask to see them or for a signed letter to the creditor to find these old applications.
5. Are advances from parents, other family members or "friends" truly "loans", or are they, in fact,"gifts" that suddenly become "loans" after the spouses separate or realize that they are going to separate? Is there paper documenting the "loan?" Does the original cheque say "loan" on the bank's copy (i.e. the copy that was microfiched)?

These are only a few probing questions that any competent family law solicitor will investigate in the appropriate case. The self-employed spouse must always assume that these questions will be raised. He should then be completely forthright and provide whatever papers are necessary to document his full and honest disclosure.

Accurate accounting critical

Where self-employed individuals are involved, it is also often crucial to retain a qualified forensic accountant with extensive experience in family law. Such an accountant prepares a list of questions and helps assess the answers received or, when acting for the self-employed spouse, prepares the spouse for such questions before completing his financial disclosure form.

In certain cases, where such a self-employed spouse realizes that he's lied in the past about his income on tax returns, he can file a revised return and pay the interest. This is sometimes preferable to facing the consequences of lying to a Judge.

In many cases, the costs of such probing or preparing to face these types of questions may be overwhelming and unnecessary. In other cases, where appropriate, these "short term" costs are inconsequential compared to the benefit of insisting on such disclosure.

When is such a case appropriate? Ask your lawyer.

Leslie Dan awarded Chevalier Cross of the Order of Merit

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hungarian-born entrepreneur and philanthropist Leslie Dan was honoured recently at the House of Lords in London, England.

The prestigious Chevalier's Cross of the Order of Merit was presented to Dan by The Most Reverend Archbishop Mikhail of the Grand Magistry of the Religious and Military Order of St. Catherine of Sinai at a dinner in Westminster Palace.

Dan was cited for his efforts "to promote the idea of community and brotherhood and... the cause of taking care of one another," and particularly for his recent gift to the University of Toronto for the construction of a new building for the pharmacy faculty, which will allow it to double its number of students. Construction will commence later this year and is to be completed in 2003.

Dan, who spent World War II living as a Gentile, one step ahead of the S.S., came to Canada by way of Germany in 1947 as a young war refugee.

He arrived with little knowledge of English, no family, and only $5 in his pocket. He attended Harbord Collegiate, learned English and caught up on the education he missed during the war years.

Working as a lumberjack and a cocktail waiter to put himself through university, he graduated from the U of T's school of pharmacy in 1954.

In 1956, he established International Pharmacy, a company which translated prescriptions in foreign languages or prescriptions sent to foreign countries and in 1959 received an MBA. Six years later, he founded Novopharm Limited, whose mandate was to produce high-quality, moderately priced pharmaceuticals.

Last year, Dan sold Novopharm to Teva Pharmaceutical Company, which operates worldwide. He remains chair of Novopharm Canada, as well as chair of Novopharm's two Hungarian subsidiaries, Human and Humanpharm Hungary. He is also on the board of Teva Israel.

As well, Dan heads a biotech operation founded in 1990 – originally called Novopharm Biotech but now called Viventia – which is dedicated to finding a more effective medication for cancer.

Leslie Dan receives the Chevalier's Cross of the Order of Merit for his humanitarian efforts.

Dan is well-known for his many contributions to charitable and communal causes in Israel, Toronto and throughout the world. He established the Dan Family Park in Tel Aviv and was one of the donors of Yad Vashem's multi-media educational building in Jerusalem. A supporter of Aish HaTorah, he is a founding member of Toronto's Village Shul.

Since 1985, Dan has been active in an organization called Canadian Medicine Aid Programme (Can-Map), which he founded to provide life saving medicine and other aid to those sick in Third World countries. He has also made a major contribution to the fundraising drive to build a new wing for the Jewish Hospital in Budapest.

Dan's philanthropy has brought him much recognition. In 1995, he was honoured at the 47th annual Negev Dinner.

At the awards ceremony in London, Dan was accompanied by his wife Anna and Torontonians Mary and Tom Beck.

He says he was "thrilled to be honoured at the spectacular affair in a building that is full of history, magnificent paintings of most kings and queens and many charters and historical documents... such an award for a Jewish boy by an organization that is one of the finest religious groups, dedicated to humanitarian causes, is not bad."

The Order of St. Catherine, founded in the sixth century, has a monastery in Sinai. The Order notes that "The spot where the monastery now stands is revered as the site of the Burning Bush."

Canadian Friends of Peace Now co-president puts opinion of Sharon-led government on hold

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Herb (Av) Sohn, the new co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, is taking a wait-and-see attitude toward Ariel Sharon, Israel's incoming prime minister.

"We'll see what kind of a government he forms and what his policies will be," said Sohn, who succeeds Erez Anzel.

"We'll take our lead from Peace Now in Israel," he added. "Hopefully, we can be supportive of what his government will do. We're hopeful we can find ways of promoting peace."

Now 71, Sohn was born in Charleston, South Carolina, and raised in Jacksonville, Florida.

He went to Israel in 1950 to enrol in a Jewish Agency leadership course after studying political science, history and law at the University of Florida.

"I liked Israel and decided to stay," he said.

During his six-year sojourn in Israel, he lived in Jerusalem, on Kibbutz Gal-On and in Tel Aviv.

On the kibbutz, he was a youth leader and an electrician's assistant. In Tel Aviv, he was a purchaser for a company that manufactured commercial pavilions.

While there, he met and married Dit Persofsky of Toronto. They have five children, two of whom were born in Israel, and four grandchildren.

Asked why he left, he replied, "Israel didn't need many BAs in political science and history."

Sohn has been back only once, in the mid-1970s, when he and his wife marked their 25th wedding anniversary.

"We still have lots of friends in Israel, on and off the kibbutz."

He settled in Toronto in 1956 and studied social work at the University of Toronto.

He worked for the Jewish Community Centre when it was known as the Toronto YM-YWHA, and was assistant director of the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

He has been a member of Canadian Jewish Congress and on the advisory committee of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

He joined Canadian Friends of Peace Now in the early 1980s.

"I was very much concerned about the strife in Israel," he explained.

As co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, Sohn will work closely with Sheldon Gordon, the political director, and Mintzy Clement, the treasurer.

Frank Guttman of Montreal serves as Peace Now's other co-president.

Curators may be isolated at work, but not at conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish museum world is very much alive, according to a Toronto participant at the recent four-day Council of American Jewish Museums conference.

Bonnie Lawrence Shear, who has been working on establishing a Jewish museum in Toronto for the past half-dozen years, said the conference – which was hosted by New York's Center for Jewish History and attended by over 250 people from North America, Israel and eastern and western Europe – was "wonderful and vibrant." She is sad, however, that her own project has had difficulty getting off the ground because of lack of funding.

She feels a responsibility for her generation – she is just turning 60 – to preserve history so her children and grandchildren will know how their predecessors struggled and were successful, she said. Start-up funding would facilitate video recording of older community members. "We're losing them every day," said Lawrence Shear.

Toronto has "such a vibrant, multi-ethnic [Jewish] community," Lawrence Shear noted. "We have [Jewish] museums, but not specifically devoted to the history of Toronto, Ontario or Canada."

In fact, Toronto had over half a dozen participants at the conference, including Dorion Liebgott, curator of the Reuben & Helene Dennis Museum at Beth Tzedec Congregation; Pat Dickinson, museum coordinator of the Silverman Heritage Jewish Museum at the Baycrest Centre; and Robin Gofine, UJA FEDERATION's director of community planning for Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiatives.

Liebgott, a veteran of at least five of the annual conferences, said most synagogue-based (and, more specifically, synagogue-funded) museums have lower budgets and fewer staff members than their independent counterparts.

"There are definitely issues specific to synagogue museums," she said. Liebgott was able to address those issues with her colleagues as a facilitator at a session on synagogue museums.

For her, the most important and enriching part of the conference was meeting colleagues. With her only other staff member a one-day-a-week assistant curator, she, like Dickinson, admitted to feeling "somewhat isolated" in terms of contact with other Jewish museum professionals.

A previous conference in Mississippi motivated Liebgott to bring Bagels and Grits, an exhibit on Jews of the Mississippi Delta to her museum.

When she runs a special exhibit, she noted, the number of museum visitors (including groups of Jewish and non-Jewish schoolchildren) triples. Her next such exhibit, on Jewish weddings, will open next month. In the works for next year is a major exhibit on the Toronto garment industry.

Liebgott found the theme of this year's conference, The Future of the Jewish Past, thought-provoking and an accurate reflection of museums' responsibility to teach people – now and into the future – about their history.

Speakers included Columbia University professor Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi and author Helen Epstein. Among the issues addressed were genealogy, restitution (including restitution of Holocaust Art) and professional development.

Toronto native Jillian Gould, the 28-year-old director of education at New York's Eldridge Street Project – based at a historic 19th-century synagogue – facilitated a session for young professionals on networking. Issues that emerged included being creative and making one's mark in an established institution.

"There are quite a few [career] opportunities for young people," Gould noted.

Mizrachi gets new executive director

Tepperman succeeds Rabbi Gopin

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jerry Tepperman has taken up the position of executive director of Mizrachi of Canada, succeeding Rabbi Menachem Gopin, who made aliyah last year.

Working for Mizrachi is not just a job for the 50-year-old Toronto native. Tepperman is personally committed to the religious Zionist ideals of the organization.

"Mizrachi believes in Orthodox values and traditions, with Torah study as the central part of those traditions. This, then, is bound up with the land of Israel and its future," he said.

"Mizrachi has a long history of making a difference to the Toronto [and the Montreal] communities – I wanted to be involved with such an organization and contribute to it."

Jerry Tepperman

While Mizrachi of Canada is connected philosophically with the various religious Zionist parties in Israel, Tepperman said, its major activity is to raise funds for a whole range of religious institutions, from Bnei Akiva schools in Toronto, to the yeshivot hesder, yeshivas that combine religious study with army service, to technical colleges.

He said that the organization co-operates as much as it can with Emunah Women of Canada, its sister organization. "We have a good working relationship with them, and we hope to expand it, especially in the field of adult education."

Tepperman said that Mizrachi is "conscious of the need to inculcate youth in the values of religious Zionism at an early age." To that end, it supports Bnei Akiva, financially, through mentorship, and by supporting Camp Moshava, its camp near Peterborough.

Mizrachi also tries to foster young leadership with its Yavnah program for university-aged people.

Tepperman wants to give more priority to adult education, such as study opportunities, speakers and working with other organizations to create programs to appeal to a wide range of people.

Mizrachi took part in the recent rally for Jerusalem at Shaarei Shomayim, and sponsors a Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut service, "to complement the community celebration of Israel's Independence Day."

Tepperman hoped to have a program this year for Yom Yerushalayim as well, but because it falls on the same day as the UJA Federation walkathon, it may be the night before, or scaled down, so as not to detract from the community event.

He praised Kurt Rothschild, world president of Mizrachi-Hapoel Hamizrachi, the parent body, for spearheading a campaign which so far has raised over $50,000 for families that have suffered losses during the recent wave of terrorism.

At the moment, Tepperman said, the position is only part-time, and he is working on his masters degree in Jewish education at York University.

Hockey guy Lende loves the entertainment business

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As career paths go, professional hockey coach to event planner/sales co-ordinator is not that much of a stretch.

True, when you're selling space in a magnificent ballroom, you're not likely to send a goon over the boards to rough up your competitor's executive chef. And the chances are remote that you'll call for a measurement of the alcohol content of your opponent's bar menu, though it is possible you might pull the car jockey to put an extra man on the dining room floor.

Still, they are similarities. In both, you've got to be a people person, someone who gets along with everyone, who loves to shmooze and network, who can press the flesh and make new friends at the drop of a hat.

Michael Lende is one of the few to successfully straddle both worlds. A hockey instructor who ran his own hockey schools in the Detroit area, he also served as an assistant coach with the Detroit Vipers of the International Hockey League and later coached the Toronto Marlboroughs midget team.

That was then. Today he's the sales co-ordinator and "the face" behind the Liberty Grand, the opulent entertainment complex currently undergoing a $10 million renovation on the CNE grounds.

In his current capacity, Lende is in charge of booking the mega-facility so that the ambitious project turns a profit for its visionary and founder, Nick DiDonato.

'It's all about relationships...If you know how to service people properly, they'll keep coming back.'

With the Liberty Grand slated to open in June, Lende has been busy working the phones, calling old contacts and meeting with potential clients to showcase the facility. If the building – with its ornate Beaux Arts facade, soaring 27-foot ceilings, 20-foot arched windows, Lakefront view and charming colonnaded courtyard – doesn't sell itself, Lende is there to close the deal.

"It's all about relationships," Lende, 30, explains. "If you know how to service people properly, they'll keep coming back."

Lende brings all the enthusiasm of a rookie tapped for power play duty to his new position. For the past three months, since he took on the job, he rises each morning at 7 am, excited by the day ahead.

"I love this. This is like electricity for me," he said. "I was meant to be in the entertainment industry."

Just a few years ago, Lende was a hockey man through and through. Not only did he coach for a living, but as a young man he was developing a reputation for evaluating talent and improving players' skills.

He had opened a couple of athletic development schools for kids in Michigan which were successful in their own right.

By chance, he was asked by a sports company familiar with his hockey organizational skills to plan an event at a Detroit hotel.

Lende accepted the challenge and arranged a dinner and dance for 500 people.

"I loved it. I loved it all, from booking the band to co-ordinating the dinner," he said.

By 1994, he was co-ordinating weddings, bar mitzvahs and corporate functions while running a couple of hockey schools.

With not enough hours in the day to do both, he hired a professional to run the schools and before long, "I had nothing to do with hockey. The other stuff was more financially rewarding and more enjoyable."

A couple of years ago, Lende returned to Toronto. Marriage and a house along the Bathurst corridor followed along with a decision to go full bore into the event planning business.

His first project was to scout the location for an entertainment venue. The Capital on Yonge street, an old vaudeville house used as a movie theatre, seemed a natural. He contacted his friend Corey Mandell, who put together the consortium that acquired and renovated the old theatre. As director of operations, Lende booked the facility with corporate functions, weddings and, of course, bar mitzvahs.

"I was starting to get a nice reputation as a guy who had vision and who knew how to get a venue up and running," he said.

Within a few months, he was fielding offers to coordinate other events. Before long, he left the Capital to work on four other venues. Everything from marketing to renovations to recommending a wine list came within his bailiwick.

"After a few months, I was so busy, I was going completely meshuge," he said.

Around that time, he heard from DiDonato of the Liberty Entertainment Group. Liberty had gained a reputation for giving new life to old facilities (the Phoenix) and for renovating heritage buildings and making them into the trendy place to be (The Courthouse Market Grille, the Rosewater Supper Club).

Lende met DiDonato, toured the Ontario Government Building at Exhibition Place, and was sold on its prospects as a high end entertainment complex.

Lende signed on as sales co-ordinator.

"I had missed having a home base," he explained. "I'm someone who takes pride in what I'm doing."

The massive government building was erected in 1926, but it had fallen into disuse. Other than 18 days in the summer when it was used as a casino during the Ex, it was largely vacant.

When the renovations are completed, "there's going to be nothing in the city like it," Lende said.

It will feature four main ballrooms, which can accommodate from 200 to 1,400 people, an outdoor courtyard and eventually, a rooftop patio. Included in the 40,000-square foot kitchen space in the lower level will be room for a kosher facility, with food prepared on site.

The Liberty Grand seems to be proving a popular attraction. "In the last month, I booked 41 weddings to 2003," he said.

In the meantime, he hasn't completely given up on hockey. He coaches the Junior Canadians AAA Peewee team with his wife Melissa, who's a teacher by profession. He still loves the game and even though he turned down an assistant coaching position with the Tampa Bay Lightning about three years ago, he doesn't regret the decision. The instability of life as a professional hockey coach could not outweigh the comforts of a solid and stable family life. And selling is way more fun.

Designer of Berlin Holocaust monument unapologetic about work

Expects vast majority in German city will dislike it

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Architect Peter Eisenman, the designer of a much-heralded Holocaust monument scheduled to be built in central Berlin, claims that the vast majority of Berliners will dislike it.

His project, called the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, will open in two years from now.

It will occupy a choice four-acre plot near the Brandenburg Gate and will consist of 2,700 gray concrete stones.

In a talk at the Art Gallery of Ontario last week, Eisenman, an American from New York City, said he suspects that 90 percent of Berliners would have vetoed the project had they been consulted.

The memorial, whose approval was sanctioned by Germany's parliament, touches a chord of anxiety, anger and resentment in the hearts and minds of Berliners, he claimed.

"If the project brings back anti-Semitism, so be it," said Eisenman. "It means it's already here."

Eisenman explained that the memorial's purpose is to highlight the enormity of the Holocaust.

"For Germans, it's a very courageous thing to build."

He said the prime movers behind it were Helmut Kohl, the former chancellor, and Michael Naumann, the ex-minister of culture.

"Kohl was very, very emotional about this project."

Eisenman suggested that Naumann's enthusiasm was related to the fact that his father was of partial Jewish origin.

A professor of architecture at The Cooper Union in New York City, Eisenman said he submitted his design with a great deal of trepidation, certain it would be difficult for his psyche.

He said he wanted to produce a monument that imparted various sensations – silence, terror, angst and claustrophobia – and engendered a feeling of time and space.

Raised as a secular Jew, Eisenman observed that the project has changed him.

"I never wanted to be known as a Jewish architect. I'm an architect who happens to be Jewish. But this project will mark me as a Jewish architect."

He added, "I'm doing this project as a Jew, not an architect."

He said he has no idea whether it will be regarded as successful, "though I think it will be what I want it to be."

In his estimation, the site will attract two million visitors a year.

It will not be a theme park kind of attraction, he warned. "To walk into it won't be a pleasant experience. It'll be quite horrendous."

Weinberg was known for acts of charity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rebbetzen Phyllis Weinberg, well known in Toronto's Orthodox community for her work in education and her many acts of charity, died last month after a long illness. She was 73.

She was probably best known in recent years for her creation of the Shmiras Haloshon Organization, the goal of which was to discourage idle gossip. Some 1,000 women are now involved in the campaign. It has recently spread to New York, Hamilton, Ottawa and Edmonton.

Obituary

Weinberg was born in Tuchin, in Poland, and grew up in Chattanooga, Tenn.

When she married Rabbi Shneur Weinberg, she moved to Detroit with him, and then when he became a principal at Eitz Chaim in 1958, to Toronto. He eventually served as senior principal of the school.

She has been active in Camp Agudah, Bnos Agudas Yisroel, Bais Yaakov, and Eitz Chaim Mothers' Association, which she helped found. She created programs for the Eitz Chaim staff which served to strengthen the bonds between them and to maintain morale.

Weinberg graduated from OISE, and earned her BA., MEd and PhD in psychotherapy. Besides working in private practice, she established the Orthodox Counselling Service, serving as its in-house psychotherapist.

Her daughter-in-law, Rochelle, told The CJN that she became interested in promoting "communicating in a positive way, using the tongue for good things," when she ran for school trustee. She wrote articles, poetry and a children's book on the subject.

She performed many acts of kindness and generosity, Rochelle said. "People in trouble came to her, and she took on their burdens."

This even extended to such acts as giving a new coat she had bought the same day to a poor woman who had come to visit her.

Weinberg was awarded the Canada 125 Commemorative Medal and the York Region Champion Award.

Family was very important to her, Rochelle said. She established a cousins club, where all her grandchildren ("no parents allowed!") would spend time with her and her husband.

"She was full of life. All ages related to her."

Weinberg is survived by her husband, Shneur, now an educational consultant; children Rabbi Moshe, Sori, Devora and Chavi; sisters Edith Hochler, Frances Gluckowsky and Lillian Bobrowsky of Toronto, and Rose Feiffer of Brooklyn, as well as 14 grandchildren.

Students get new pro-Israel cyberspace weapon

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israelpride.com, a new Montreal-based Web site, is the latest weapon in Jewish students' pro-Israel arsenal.

The site is to be launched officially on March 8, yet it's been up and running since January and has recorded about 1,500 "hits." Unprecendented in scope, it will serve Jewish students nationwide.

"This really has something for everyone," said 20-year-old Eddie Shostak, a political science student at McGill University who spearheaded work on the site.

Israelpride.com is remarkably slick for an idea that didn't get off the ground seriously until last December, although Shostak said the concept's been "flowing in the air" for several years.

Serving as the catalyst was the intifadah that began last fall, which touched off never before seen levels of pro-Palestinian activities on campuses. Shostak's brother, Rob, designed the site while Eddie and a six-member research team co-ordinated its content.

The bottom line for Shostak and other members of the team was to offer something for everyone, especially the tools to make students more informed on the issues and to counter the anti-Israel impetus.

The "Israel 101" page, for example, is a primer about Israel with 19 links, ranging from history, geography and government to health, science/technology, and music and the arts. A highlighted link at the bottom of the page focuses on Israel-Canada relations. Hit on that and you can look up Canada's position on key issues, Canada's UN voting patterns and other topics.

Shostak said two of the most important pages are called "Current Conflict" and "Take Action."

The first provides links to many of the issues Jewish students need to know to make the Israeli case on campus. "Take Action" has links to subjects like media relations and MIAs and tells students how they can lobby for Israel.

Another major page on the site, called "On Campus News," contains information about the climate and various events on campus as well as a full listing of Canadian universities with a synopsis of each one's situation. It also contains links to materials such as posters and flyers that can be downloaded for use at universities across the country.

The site also has a guest book for comments, humour sections and student trip information. Three Canadian students living in Israel will be emailing bi-weekly reports about the Israeli mood and current goings-on, Shostak said.

One of the key factors to Israelpride.com's success, Shostak said, will be the ability to "maintain" it. The site has a local PR and "communications person" who will "co-ordinate what's coming in." It will be updated every Thursday and Sunday and will depend on students sending in the latest news related to their campuses.

Israelpride.com will also be a major part of a huge initiative to launch a nationwide Jewish student organization called CISPAC (Canada-Israel Student Public Affairs Committee).

The organization, should the project come to fruition, will consolidate all elements of Israeli student activities at a national level.

Jewish civil rights benefits said mixed

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The acquisition of civil rights by Jews in Western societies yielded positive and negative results, says a Presbyterian minister who has been in the forefront of promoting interfaith understanding and reconciliation in Canada.

In a talk titled Jewish Emancipation: Blessings and Curses, Rev. Peter Gilbert concluded that the net result of this historical process was that Jews were able to take their just place in society.

Delivering the annual Catherine Gilbert Memorial Lecture at the Toronto School of Theology, Rev. Gilbert said that emancipation, achieved over two centuries of efforts, offered Jews "a fresh beginning" after one thousand years of constant oppression and discrimination.

Emancipation, the former chair of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto said, left Jewish life in a much-improved state and enabled Jews to contribute to the betterment of society at large.

At the same time, he added, emancipation galvanized the forces of anti-Semitism, culminating in the Holocaust, and heightened the prevalence of mixed marriages.

Emancipation arose from the Enlightenment, the guiding principle of which was "the oneness" of human beings.

The emergence of rationalism and mercantilism gave rise to more liberal attitudes in Europe, while the 1776 Declaration of Independence brought the balm of emancipation to the United States, Rev. Gilbert said.

The idea of human equality was advanced by such thinkers as John Locke. But the retention of Christianity as a state religion was an obstacle in the path toward emancipation.

Spurred on by the 1781 Austrian Edict of Tolerance, which granted limited privileges to Jews, Jewish figures ranging from the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn to the poet Heinrich Heine strove to advance the cause of German liberalism in the face of fierce opposition.

In Europe, Rev. Gilbert noted, emancipation did not come all at once. Jews in France were given civil rights after the French Revolution, but Jews in the Russian empire had to wait much longer. By contrast, Jews in Britain and Germany acquired civil rights in 1858 and 1871, respectively.

Kreplach's a Purim tradition for some

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Kreplach, a kind of dumpling, can be filled with meat, chicken or vegetables. It is a tradition for some people to eat kreplach on Purim because they believe the hidden filling in the kreplach relates to the fact that God's presence in the Purim story is hidden (but implied).

Kreplach are very easy to make and can be eaten in soups, as a side dish, or even as a main dish for lunch!

EASY KREPLACH

1½ cups cooked chicken
¼ cup chopped onion
2 tbsp. pareve margarine
Salt
Pepper
1 package won ton skins

In a pan sauté the onion in margarine. Sauté until golden and then remove and cool.

Place the cooked chicken in a food processor. Add the cooked onions to the chicken. Add salt and pepper to taste. Process until there are no big pieces, but not to a puree. Place 1 tsp. of meat filling in centre of each won ton skin and fold into triangles. Pinch sides together. It helps to moisten the edges so they will form a better seal.

Let stand on floured surface for 15 minutes to prevent sticking or opening during cooking.

Drop the kreplach into 2 quarts of boiling salted water or soup (one at a time, making sure not to crowd them). Cook for about 15 minutes. These are also good pan fried in margarine or deep-fried. Makes about 15 to 18 pieces. This can be doubled.

VEGETARIAN KREPLACH

2+ cups flour
2 large eggs
Water
½ cup grated onion
1 tbsp. oil
½ cup grated carrot
½ cup finely chopped fresh spinach
Salt
½ cup cooked kasha
1 clove garlic
Salt and pepper to taste

Place the flour in a bowl, make an indentation in the centre and drop the broken eggs in the centre. Add a drip or two of the water into the eggs and mix until the dough is too sticky and firm for the fork. Then, using your hands, knead in the unmixed flour little by little until all the flour is absorbed into a ball of dough.

Add tepid water or extra flour as necessary to keep the dough moist but not sticky. Put the ball of dough in a bowl, cover it with a damp (not wet) towel and set it aside while you make the filling.

Sauté the garlic and onion in the oil over a low heat in a skillet. Mix with a wooden spoon until the onions begin to get soft, then add the carrots, again stirring constantly to keep the vegetables from burning and to vaporize the moisture they release.

Finally, add the spinach. Again continue stirring until the mixture is rather dry (you may have to drain the excess water released by the spinach). Then remove the skillet from the heat and allow the mixture to cool. Add the cooked (cool) kasha, mix thoroughly and season to taste.

While the filling cools, divide the ball of dough into two parts. Set one part onto a floured pastry board and roll evenly flat to a thickness of about 1/16 of an inch (or as thin as possible without tearing).

Cut the sheet of dough into squares about 2½ to 3 inches on a side. Remove excess trimmed dough to the covered bowl. Using a teaspoon, scoop a bit of the mixture into the centre of each dough square. With a finger moistened with the water (not a wet finger), sketch along the cut edges of each square.

Then fold the square into the shape of a triangle and, keeping the mixture tightly contained in the centre of the folded dough, press the two halves with enough pressure to pinch both sides of the dough together. As you work on the second half of the dough ball, let the formed kreplach sit uncovered for about half an hour to dry a little and to secure the sealed dough.

Then, in a large pot of boiling water, cook each of the two (or more) batches separately for about 15 minutes. When the kreplach float for a minute or so they are fully cooked and may be removed with a slotted spoon. Plunge the cooked kreplach in an ice bath to shock the dough and stop the cooking process.

The kreplach can be served in chicken soup, in mushroom barley or split pea.

You can also fry them in a little oil with thinly sliced onions and have them as an appetizer or a side dish. Wash the onions in cold water, pat dry, then dust the kreplach and the very thinly sliced onions with flour before you fry them. The kreplach will brown without sticking and the onions will take on a stiffer, almost crispy characteristic. Makes about 30.

CHEESE FILLING FOR KREPLACH

2 cups baker's or pot cheese, ricotta or creamed cottage cheese, sieved
2 egg yolks
1 tbsp. sour cream (omit if using creamed cottage cheese)
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

In a bowl blend all the ingredients together until thoroughly mixed. Roll out, cut and fill kreplach dough (use approx. 1 tsp. filling for each), seal, and cook in boiling salted water for 15-20 minutes. Remove carefully with a slotted spoon onto a heated platter. You can pour ½ cup melted butter over the kreplach and serve with cold sour cream. Makes 20-24 kreplach.

CHINESE KREPLACH

Filling:
1 lb. ground veal, turkey, or chicken
1 tbsp. minced scallions
1 tsp. finely minced ginger
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. sugar
1 tbsp. oriental sesame oil
1 tsp. cornstarch
2 tsp. white wine
1 egg
⅛ tsp. white pepper
1 tbsp. corn oil
Won ton wrappers

In a bowl combine the filling ingredients and mix until the mixture is light and sticky. Keep the won ton wrappers covered with a damp cloth to prevent drying. Place a wrapper on the counter with one corner pointing toward you. Put ½ tsp. of the filling on this corner. Roll the corner over the filling to form a roll about halfway up the wrapper. Moisten the left corner of the rolled wrapper with water, bring around the right corner and stick it on top of the moistened corner. Press the corners to seal.

Repeat this until all the filling is used. Cover the finished won tons with a moist dish towel to prevent drying. To boil the won tons, bring 2 quarts of water to a boil. Turn off the heat and add the won tons.

Return the heat to high and bring the pot back to a boil. Then lower the heat to a simmer and cook gently for 10 minutes. Transfer the won tons with a slotted spoon to soup bowls or a serving plate.

To deep-fry these won tons, heat a wok or skillet and add the 2 cups of oil. When the oil is hot, cook no more than 10 to 12 won tons at a time. Fry until lightly browned, turning them frequently. Remove and drain.

Canada urged to beef up fight against terrorism

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada must do more to battle international terrorists who would use this country as a haven and base of operations, says Canadian Jewish Congress.

Ottawa should step up its fight with better support of its security services, tighter border and immigration controls and improved enforcement of the Criminal Code, Congress says.

CJC last month presented a six-point plan on countering terrorism to five federal departments: immigration, justice, defence, foreign affairs and the solicitor general.

And last week, Congress officials met with representatives of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (formerly Revenue Canada) and other departments to discuss impending legislation that would strip charitable status from groups that raise money for international terrorist organizations.

Late last month, national revenue minister Martin Cochon said the bill will ensure that "front organizations" can't pose as charities.

CJC's brief to the government also came on the heels of allegations in a French court that a Montreal apartment served as a base for an international terrorist network tied to Osama bin Laden, one of the most wanted terrorists in the world.

Canada has long been criticized as soft on the fight against terrorism. This country has been accused of providing a haven for members of well-known terror groups and a place where they can go about recruiting new followers and raising money in the guise of charities and social welfare organizations.

CJC's brief did not mention Arab groups in particular, but both Hamas and Hezbollah, and organizations with links to them, have in the past been accused of getting easy access to Canada and its porous border with the United States.

Congress quoted a former director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) as saying that with the exception of the United States, Canada is home to more active terrorist groups than any other country.

Terrorists, according to CSIS, use Canada "as a very important source for fund-raising as well as procurement of equipment and identification and travel documents, and as a safe haven and support base from which to plan and direct terrorist operations elsewhere," CJC stated, adding the likelihood of Canada itself becoming a target has increased as a result.

With its multicultural and pluralistic society, Canada "is especially vulnerable to terrorist infiltration."

Vigilance must also be increased because more terror groups have at their disposal chemical, biological and nuclear weapons of mass destruction.

CJC's recommendations to the government include:

• Canada's security services (CSIS, the RCMP and the investigations arm of the department of immigration) should be beefed up. This can be done, Congress said, without compromising civil liberties.

• Canada must fulfill its commitment as a signatory to last year's United Nations Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism. United States and Britain have outlawed terrorist fund-raising, but Canada has yet to follow suit. "This is all the more surprising," says CJC, "since Canada chaired a United Nations committee on this very issue."

Amendments to the Criminal Code must be a top priority. New legislation should criminalize fund-raising for groups declared to be terrorist and make it illegal for individuals to contribute financial or other material support to such groups.

• Immigration officers should be given greater powers to detain arrivals that arouse terrorism-related suspicions.

• Canada should move quickly to establish with the United States a continental border defense against terrorism.

• Ottawa should press for stronger united stands against terrorism on the international stage.

• Canada should help identify and isolate countries which sponsor terrorism.

Montreal Jews, Palestinians stage weekly vigil

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Every Friday at noon since Feb. 7, a small contingent of Montreal Jews – joined by Palestinians of like mind – gather for one hour at the Israeli consulate.

Dressed in black and carrying signs displaying such phrases as "End the Occupation" and "A Just and Lasting Peace," they silently protest Israel's occupation of the territories and what they see as the Jewish state's culpability in the cycle of violence that has swept through the region since last fall.

It was this unprecedented level of violence, supporters say, that spurred two groups to be formed locally, although they are largely being ignored at a community level.

The first, called the Jewish Alliance Against the Occupation (JAAO), was formed last November. One of their first letters, to the Gazette, was signed by Noam Chomsky, the MIT professor and longtime vocal critic of Israel.

The second, called Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU), took shape about one month later, and includes Jews, non-Jews and Palestinians.

Freda Guttman, a 67-year-old Montreal artist, said in an interview that JAAO was created because "as Jews, we felt appalled" by the turn of events in Israel since last September.

"We felt we wanted to speak out and do our small part in influencing change," she said.

Guttman, the sister of local Peace Now leader Frank Guttman, described the Palestinians as "victims" of Israeli policies that go against the precepts of Judaism, a sentiment also expressed recently by Prof. Lillian Robinson, the director of Concordia University's Simone de Beauvoir Institute.

In an article published just last week, Robinson wrote, "If it is the Jewish mission to combat all forms of racism, it is clearly our responsibility to make sure we are not ourselves guilty of it.

"That means not occupying the Palestinian homeland [Gaza and the West Bank], not responding to children's rock-throwing with automatic weapons, not torturing prisoners, not harassing those crossing boundaries and Israel itself on their daily trips to work, not demolishing homes on bureaucratic pretexts."

PAJU, like JAAO, calls for, among other things, the immediate withdrawal of Israel from the West Bank and Gaza (in other words, to the pre-1967 borders), the end to human rights violations by Israel, and recognition of the principle of the "right of return" of Palestinians to the areas they left after 1948.

PAJU's founders, Rezeq Faraj and Bruce Katz, friends for 25 years and both teachers at the same Montreal CEGEP, said their group was created because the current situation urgently needed to be addressed.

"The idea behind our group is for Jews and Palestinians, and anyone else of good conscience, to work together and create a climate for peace," Faraj said in an interview. "The Israeli people and the Palestinian people have to start their negotiations from an equal footing, and that won't happen until the oppression is stopped.

"You can't negotiate with a boot to your head. You have to be equal."

Faraj, who was born near Bethlehem, described himself as an optimist at heart with an abiding faith that one day, Israelis and Palestinians will be able to live in their own states, side-by-side, in a harmonious relationship.

He does not support a "Jewish" state, but seeks a secular, democratic Israeli state that would live in peace with a Palestinian one. Eventually, he feels, these two states would merge into a harmonious whole.

Faraj had little faith, however, in the leadership of either Israel or the Palestinian Authority (PA), which he said does not represent the grassroots communities.

He also described the PA as corrupt and partly responsible for the deterioration in Palestinian living conditions.

Meanwhile, as authorities bicker, "Palestinians and Jews are getting killed," Faraj said.

Katz, for his part, also sees immediate withdrawal from the territories as the necessary prerequisite for Palestinian-Israeli negotiations "as equals."

Shlomo Avital, Israel's consul-general in Montreal, was aware of the weekly vigils, but had not witnessed one personally.

He said that while he had nothing against people exercising the democratic right to protest, it has been "painful" to see Jewish people, no matter how marginal their numbers, feeling that Israel is in the wrong.

In Avital's view, the groups' arguments are based upon the false premise that Israel "occupies" the Palestinian people.

In fact, he said, "90 percent of Palestinians live under Palestinian rule," with Israeli furnishing the PA police with arms.

"What occupier does that?"

Both the leadership of JAAO and PAJU said their groups would be seeking to elicit more support and to raise Jewish and non-Jewish public awareness as time goes on.

Their plans include a campaign to make a black ribbon the universal symbol for Palestinian oppression. PAJU is also considering staging a fund-raising auction to benefit Palestinian refugee camps and a local communal Passover seder for supporters.

New human rights group formed

MONTREAL — Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler has teamed up with Senator Lois Wilson to found the Parliamentary Human Rights Group (PHRG).

Cotler and Wilson, who serve as co-chairs, describe the PHRG as the first all-party, joint House-Senate group of its kind.

"It is inspired by the view that the involvement of Canadian parliamentarians in the struggle for human rights is an expression and example of our Canadian legacy and our commitment to a culture of human rights," they said in a joint statement.

"It is particularly concerned with the distinguishable – if not distinguished – role that Canadian parliamentarians can exercise, linking domestic and international concerns."

Developed as a means for humanitarian intervention in situations that threaten world peace and security, the PHRG will insist that Canada implements domestically the international human rights treaties to which it is a party. According to its mission statement, the PHRG will also promote the ratification by Canada of recognized international human rights treaties such as the American Covention on Human Rights.

The PHRG is intended to give parliamentarians and representatives of civil society organizations the opportunity to "effectively input into the periodic reports presented by Canada to the United Nations treaty bodies and assess recommendations made by Canadian and international human rights bodies on Canada."

It is expected the PHRG will work with counterpart parliamentary groups and non-governmental organizations, both nationally and internationally, through such activities as public forums, expert briefings, joint letters and meetings with government officials.

Cotler and Wilson say the PHRG will not duplicate the work of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and International Trade, or any other committee of the House of Commons or Senate.

Other executive members of PHRG are: MPs Bill Blaikie (New Democratic Party), Francine Lalonde (Bloc Québécois) and Monte Solberg (Canadian Alliance), and Senators Raynell Andreychuk and Noel Kinsella, both Progressive Conservatives. The treasurer is Montreal-area Liberal MP Raymonde Folco.

At its inaugural meeting, professor Guy Goodwin-Gill discussed the plight of refugees in Canada. A witness testimony was given by Saado Abdi, who was recognized by Canada as a convention refugee in 1991, but has yet to receive any identity or travel documents.

Cotler, a law professor on leave from McGill University, had a 25-year career as a human rights lawyer before being elected to Parliament in November 1999.

Ethics of euthanasia addressed at Aish lecture

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When it comes to medical ethics and issues such as euthanasia, Halachah keeps abreast of the latest medical and scientific technology, says Aish Hatorah Rabbi Shimon Lesserson.

Lesserson, who is associated with Winnipeg's Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue, was describing the rules related to euthanasia as part of a new Aish Hatorah luncheon lecture series created by lawyers Abe Anhang and Cary Reiss. The luncheons are held in the boardrooms of leading downtown Winnipeg law firms.

The first in the lectures series featured Harry Walsh, one of Winnipeg's most brilliant and experienced legal minds, discussing capital punishment. The session on euthanasia was held on Feb. 12, in the boardroom of Fillmore and Riley in the Trizec Building.

While Jewish religious law is set firmly against speeding a person's death, there are also admonitions against delaying a person's dying, Rabbi Lesserson said.

According to Rabbi Moshe Isserles in the Shulchan Aruch, "It is forbidden to cause the dying to die quickly, even if someone is on his deathbed for a long time... but if there is something that delays his death, one may remove it, for this does not involve any action at all, but rather the removal of a preventative agent."

As an example, Rabbi Lesserson used the idea of a respirator temporarily unable to work. If the patient cannot breathe without it, then it would be permissible not to re-start it. If the patient can still breathe but with difficulty, than it should be re-started.

Similarly, Rabbi Lesserson noted, while one is not allowed to give a dying patient a lethal injection, one can give the patient ever-increasing doses of morphine, for example, to ease the pain even though the painkiller may hasten death.

"While the principles aren't changeable, the applications are," he said.

Representing the secular point of view was University of Winnipeg philosophy professor Arthur Schafer, who believes that euthanasia is a matter of easing human suffering. He spoke at length about the Latimer case where a Saskatchewan farmer took the life of his severely disabled 12-year-old daughter and received a hefty prison sentence.

"In Sweden or Switzerland, the Latimer case would have been considered 'compassionate homicide' and Latimer would have received a lesser sentence," Schafer said. "There have been at least seven prior cases of non-voluntary euthanasia in Canada and no one has served any prison time for them."

When an adult of sound mind asks to have his life terminated, it is a different matter. Schafer recalled that 25 years ago, people used to talk about "passive" euthanasia, when a doctor pulls the plug on a dying patient and removes life support, and "indirect" euthanasia, when ever-higher doses of painkillers hasten death.

"Today," he said, "we no longer talk about 'passive' euthanasia. We have palliative care centres where the dying receive 'appropriate' care. Aggressive medical treatment is mainly in the past now. The question now is should we take the next step and legalize physician-assisted suicide as they have done in Holland?"

Schafer talked about the Dutch legislation and philosophized on the value of life when an individual has lost all consciousness or sense of personality.

Rabbi Lesserson was critical of the Dutch law on euthanasia, saying that it allows anyone over 15 to choose death. When an individual suffering from depression asked a physician to help him with his suicide, the doctor was tried, but the courts supported him and the charges were dropped.

Following his lecture, Rabbi Lesserson was asked about the Jewish view of what comes after death. One version, he said, is that the individual after death sees his life flash before him while another screen shows what his life might have been.

"That's hell," he said, "to see how you could have lived your life better."

CJC urges promotion of French language

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The French language should be promoted and should dominate Quebec's public face, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) says in its brief to the Estates-General on Language to be presented in mid-March.

But, the organization warns, Quebec's French Language Charter should be enforced in a spirit of fairness and open-mindedness."

This principle is "sometimes ignored," CJC-Q brief continues, particularly when complaints are investigated.

"The sometimes heavy-handed application and enforcement of the Charter undermine its intent, put into question this expressed spirit of fairness and open-mindedness and, on occasion, the discernment of those responsible for investigating complaints.

"Unfortunately, these occurences lead many to question whether the intent of the Charter is to promote French or to undermine the presence of languages other than French."

The brief criticizes the system of investigating anonymous complaints that turn out to be unwarranted, such as those filed against the Jewish Public Library and a business whose Hebrew lettering – an allusion to the Berson Monument case – was alleged to have not been conforming to Charter regulations.

"...[T]here was widespread sentiment in the Jewish community that the Office [de la langue française] was unfairly targeting a Jewish institution," the brief says.

Congress goes on to argue that the vitality of French can be fostered and that the language can be publicly predominant in Quebec "while co-existing with other languages."

New charities bill may pose problems

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

One of the aspects of the Jewish people that most powerfully moved Mark Twain was their tendency towards philanthropic activity. We are reliably informed that in Canada alone, there are literally thousands of Jewish charities – each collecting monies to advance some noble endeavour in healthcare, education, religion or social services.

These organizations operate within the larger institutional framework established by the government that regulates charitable activity. There is a change coming to that framework. In the coming weeks, you'll be hearing about it.

The change is in the form of new legislation that seeks to address the problem of charities fronting for enterprises that are anything but noble. Specifically, the bill, which has not yet been tabled, aims at ending the practice of terrorist groups raising money in Canada (under the guise of charity) only to use the money for terrorist activities "back home," wherever "home" is.

Jewish groups have long claimed that certain Canadian-based Muslim organizations connected to Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad raise or launder money in Canada and then channel it back to the Middle East to finance terrorism and terrorist recruitment. Similar allegations have been levelled by others against Sikhs, the Tamil Tigers and even the IRA.

When the idea of such legislation first arose, Jewish organizations offered their support to Lloyd Axworthy and Andy Scott (the then Minister of Foreign Affairs and Solicitor General respectively). Groups like the Canada Israel Committee reportedly still support such an initiative – and properly so.

But the Jewish community should be careful about how much additional discretionary power the legislation will grant the Canadian Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA). If the legislation only triggers an investigation based upon credible intelligence from CSIS, there is little to worry about.

However, if the proposed bill empowers CCRA to launch de-certification proceedings against any charity it regards as problematic, it could render numerous Jewish charities vulnerable to harassment and worse.

This is especially true with respect to Canadian-based charities that operate in Israel. Would, for example, various IDF-related charities come under suspicion or those affiliated with particular political parties or organizations?

Before it gives the as-yet unseen legislation its "hechsher," Jewish organizations had better ensure that it solves a problem rather than creates one.

Shas gets Interior Ministry from Sharon

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon's representatives initialed a deal with Shas last Sunday, bringing the party into the coalition and giving Sharon a 64-seat majority in the Knesset.

At that point, the coalition included 23 MKs from Labour, 19 from Likud, 17 from Shas, four from Yisrael Beitenu, and MK Dalia Rabin-Pelesof from the now defunct Centre party. Negotiations with Yisrael b'Aliyah were under way as of this writing and could bring the total majority in the Knesset to 68.

In addition, Sharon was still seeking to widen the coalition base before presenting the government on Wednesday, partly because not all Labour MKs were expected to vote in favour.

Likud, therefore, planned to seek an agreement Monday with the National Religious Party, which has five MKs, United Torah Judaism (UTJ), which has five, and Gesher, which has three.

Also seen as likely to join the coalition were Dan Meridor and Roni Milo, MKs from the Centre party.

At least two current MKs will not be members of the next Knesset: Uri Savir and outgoing tourism minister Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, who are leaving parliamentary politics. They were to be replaced by Nehama Ronen, a protege of Rafael Eitan, and former Likud MK David Magen.

MK Yitzhak Mordechai, if acquitted of the sexual harassment and abuse charges he faces, will also likely join the coalition, but if he is convicted, he is to be replaced by Yehiel Lasri, a former Likud activist.

The Shas deal with Likud, said party chair MK Eli Yishai, "closed the circle. We got everything we fought over with the Barak government" – the Interior Ministry (which Yishai will head, in addition to being deputy prime minister), full authority for a deputy minister in the Education Ministry over the Shas school system and full control over the Religious Affairs Ministry.

In addition, the party will get the Labour and Social Affairs Ministry, the Health Ministry and a new Ministry for Jerusalem. Furthermore, the party has received permission, within the context of the Religious Affairs Ministry, to establish a third broadcasting channel, as a way of legitimizing their pirate radio stations.

As for the Shas battle against a change in the election law that would bring back the one-ballot system, Likud and Shas agreed that the vote on the issue would not break the coalition, and Shas received permission to vote against this, when the issue comes up.

Another issue that could still stymie the entry of Shas into the coalition – and has, for the moment, blocked the UTJ faction from beginning full-fledged negotiations to join the coalition – is the question of freeing yeshiva students from national service in the army.

MK Salah Tarif, who was nominated by the Labour party on Friday to serve as a minister without portfolio in Sharon's government, will be the first non-Jewish minister in the history of the State of Israel.

The Arab population responded to Tarif's appointment with mixed emotions, with reactions ranging from happiness for his personal achievement to criticism of the fact that the Druze MK would have to sit in a cabinet that included extreme right-wing politicians.

Tarif, 47, is a resident of the village of Julis in the Galilee. He is the grandson of Sheikh Amin Tarif, the spiritual leader of the Druze community who died about six years ago. Friday, Tarif went to the grave of his grandfather and vowed to work toward more co-operation between the Druze population and the state, achieving peace in the region and turning Israel into a "country of all its citizens."

IDF: violence cannot be eradicated

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon has raised objections to the Israel Defence Forces' plans regarding measures to be taken in the territories, which Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz delivered to him last week.

Sharon has informed Mofaz that after he takes up the Prime Ministerial post, he will ask the army to review and then revise the plan, which is based on the assumption that violent confrontations on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip will persist. Sharon's office refused last night to comment on the report.

The IDF's plan, which was submitted to outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Barak at the same time, summarizes five months of conflict with the Palestinians, a well-placed source in Jerusalem said. As the IDF sees it, violence cannot be brought to a full stop in the territories, since Islamic organizations, local militia groups and critics of Arafat associated with Fatah will continue to wage an armed campaign against Israel. Even if efforts to calm tensions and contain the fighting are made, the army estimates that violence will continue at 30 percent of the peak intensity reached over the past months of clashes, the source said.

The IDF has apparently recommended that it should continue to maintain closures on Palestinian towns and villages and make selective strikes against Palestinians who are implicated in terror plans and other activities against Israel.

In addition, the IDF supports the continued application of economic pressure, including the withholding of financial remittances owed to the PA.

Iraqi Jews recall expropriations

money and property," he said. "It should be used as a wash against the Palestinian claims."

Mayer believes most of the descendants of the Iraqi Jews who fled their homes have given up on the chance of restitution. "There is no mechanism to transfer it and few Iraqis even know about the property their families had," he said. "I personally say it should go to Israel, though some may want the money for themselves or their families."

Naim Dallal, a native of Baghdad who fled in 1951, agrees the claims of Iraqi Jews should be included when Palestinian demands are considered.

"If there is a settlement with compensation for the Palestinians, Israel should get into the consideration the Jewish property, not to leave us behind. The only ones who could do it is Israel. Iraq should pay us compensation," said Dallal, an officer of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Dallal's extended family lost property – mostly real estate and cash – valued at about $450,000 U.S. in 1951 dollars. "The hope is very low" that his family, or that of any Iraqi Jews, would ever be reimbursed for the property taken from them, he said.

Asad Muallim, a Toronto veterinarian, was also born in Baghdad, but his family remained in Iraq long after most of the country's Jews fled. His family had interests in a brick factory and owned close to 20,000 dunams of farm land as well as two subdivisions of residential properties.

All that was confiscated in 1969. With the ascension to power of the Ba'ath Party in 1963, the situation turned into "hell on earth" for the country's Jews, he said. Restrictions were imposed, Jews were interrogated and tortured and coerced to sell their properties, and in 1969, 15 were hanged as Israeli spies.

Muallim's family eventually settled in Israel, though they were "financially decimated." Muallim would like to see Iraqi families compensated for their losses, but he doesn't believe their losses should be balanced against Palestinian claims. The two situations should not be linked, he said.

Vivian Roumani-Denn believes there is more to the situation than simply monetary claims. Roumani-Denn, national executive director of the American Sephardi Federation, said about 40 percent of Israel's population consists of Jews with origins in Arab lands. The Jews who found refuge in Israel lost not only their tangible possessions but "they also lost their culture, a sense of being, the loss of their family in a cultural way."

> 'There is more to the situation than simply monetary claims'

Jews were dislocated in a cultural sense, while Palestinians, whose situation is also tragic, at least were able to retain their cultural identities and a sense of continuity, she said.

Roumani-Denn, whose family fled Benghazi, Libya, said compensation "is an individual issue, but the world needs to understand that the Jews who lived for centuries in Arab countries were uprooted and had to find a solution with Israel's help.

"Israel bore the responsibility of accommodating Jews from Arab lands and they are now being asked to help the Palestinians," she said.

Even before creation of the State of Israel, Iraqi Jews faced state-sponsored discrimination. Once Iraq gained independence in 1932 from the post-World War I British Mandate, the government acted against its Jewish citizens.

"Many Jewish officials were dismissed and obstacles were continually placed in their way," states the Encyclopedia Judaica.

"During World War II, Hitler's doctrines were propagated throughout the country. The atmosphere of hostility reached its climax during the riots of Shavuot 1941, which was at the time of Rashid Ali al-Jilani's rebellion against the British. For two days, hundreds of Jews were cruelly tortured and murdered by incited mobs with the knowledge of the government; their property was looted, synagogues were profaned and only the entry of the British saved the situation," the Encyclopedia states.

Martial law was imposed on the day Israel declared independence in May 1948. The situation that followed was chaotic. Many Jews were brought into court on trumped up charges while in Basra, a prominent Jewish businessmen was publicly hanged, Mayer recalled.

In July 1948, the criminal law was amended to include Zionism as an offence, along with Communism, each punishable by seven years imprisonment, or even death.

In December 1949, martial law was cancelled and Jews were allowed to register for departure, though they had to agree to surrender their Iraqi citizenship. In March 1951, the property confiscation law came into effect.

From 1948 to 1951, a series of bombing incidents targeting Jews included attacks on a synagogue, a restaurant and a Jewish-owned car dealership. Those attacks speeded up the Jewish departure, Mayer said.

Feb. 26

• The central committee of the Labour Party voted 67 percent to 33 percent to join a unity government under Prime Minister-elect Ariel Sharon.

Feb. 27

• After a meeting in the West Bank between Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and Fatah leaders, the leaders announced they would continue the uprising against Israel.

• Police arrested three men with some $2 million (US) worth of Judaica believed to have been stolen in Israel and Europe. The three residents of Bnei Brak were detained when they tried to sell the ornaments to a Tel Aviv store.

Feb. 28

• The IDF is looking into ways to legally arrange security patrols being conducted by settlers. Since the IDF lacks the practical ability to prevent all such patrols, it is preferable, the IDF said, that the patrols be co-ordinated with the army.

March 1

• The military wings of Hamas and Hezbollah are among 21 groups labelled as "terrorist" by Britain. The list is part of the country's anti-terrorism legislation.

• One person was killed and nine injured when a van exploded in an apparent terrorist attack in the north.

March 2

• The Likud plan of putting together a coalition comprising only itself, Labour and Shas ran into difficulties when the party failed to reach an agreement with Shas negotiators on two key issues. Sharon may not be able to present his government on Wednesday, as he had hoped.

The media's obsession with Israel

According to Reports

In a recent editorial on Israel, The Economist intoned that "Israel, a tiny democratic state of five million Jews and one million Arabs gets the coverage of a front-ranking nation." If we take front-ranking nations like Britain, France, Germany, and Japan, The Economist is wrong because Israel often gets more attention than any of them, and, at times, even more attention than all of them combined.

The Economist also wrote that "Israel and the Palestinians attract disproportionate attention." This is misleading because the disproportionate attention given to the Palestinians is only a function of the world's obsession with Israel.

So when the magazine continues with the observation that "the Palestinians…are a hard-done-by minority but no more than, say, the Kurds" (about whom a scant word has been said for many years), we are reminded of what The New Republic wrote almost a year into the first Intifadah, and a few months after Saddam Hussein had gassed 5,000 Iraqi Kurds – men, women and children – in Halabja in March 1988:

"The Israelis have been the object of more international opprobrium for their use of tear gas than the Iraqis have for their use of mustard gas. This wild asymmetry cannot be put down to the low expectations international opinion has for those who rule Baghdad…The Kurds' historical and moral case certainly is older and stronger than that of the Palestinians. But they have not been fortunate enough to have the Jews as their enemy."

The Economist, which mostly ignores the plight of the Kurds, never stops to reflect why this is so. Only part of the explanation rests with the ever-present fact of convenience: Israel, being the sole democracy in the entire Middle East, is the only country that allows the media free and unfettered access to a hot story involving the Palestinians, and must endure the media microscope set on high magnification. The Kurds, suffering in "closed zones" away from the glare of the media, receive virtually no attention.

But that is only part of the story. More on this next week.

Terror is a test of Israeli society

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Palestinian terrorism inside the borders of Israel should not be seen in isolation as the work of Hamas or Islamic Jihad, which are at one with Fatah, the Tanzim and various members of the Palestinian Authority (PA) security services, in their aim to break Israel's spirit and force concessions.

The terrorist actions are winning broad support from Palestinian society, according to various public opinion polls. This is a general offensive timed to coincide with the arrival of Ariel Sharon's government and the Arab summit at the end of the month. Right after the Arab summit comes Land Day, and the PA is hoping to drag at least some of Israel's Arabs into demonstrations and a general strike.

According to this analysis, the Palestinians will be making special efforts to increase terrorist activity inside Israel. It is a preliminary offensive, before Sharon's government is installed and before they have heard if he has any suggestions for ways to continue negotiations.

Sharon is being tested by Yasser Arafat. Arafat posed a difficult challenge for Sharon even before the latter was to be installed in the prime minister's office. But it is also a test of Israeli society. Within a few days, Sharon will have to prove he can fulfil his promise to restrain the terrorism and guarantee security for Israelis.

The latest terror incidents ostensibly fall within the responsibility of the outgoing government of Ehud Barak, but they are meant mostly as a "hot reception" for Sharon. He is getting real time briefings on security incidents, but it is clear that any unusual Israeli military steps at this time would need both Sharon's and Barak's approval.

A similar terror offensive in 1996, when Shimon Peres was prime minister, resulted in a suspension of the negotiations with the Palestinians and eventually to the Sharm el-Sheikh summit. They also forced an end to the Wye Plantation talks between Israel and Syria. Now they threaten only the possibility of the negotiations resuming once Sharon takes office.

The main burden falls on the shoulders of the Israeli public. The public's ability to withstand the pressure is at stake. So far, Israeli society has stood up under the pressure in an extraordinary way.

The immediate response is to let no more Palestinian workers, without exceptions, into Israel, because of the dangers associated with doing so.

But we are still at the stage where terrorism creates extremism and the demand for revenge and hatred. The events last Sunday in Netanya, when a Palestinian worker was savaged by an Israeli mob after the bombing, can testify to that.

The growing extremism is also being felt inside the army, among both draftees and reservists. The question is: What might things look like when the war continues and gets worse?

PA a terror group, chief of staff says

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz recently blamed the leadership of the Palestinian Authority for ordering attacks against Israel and adopting terrorism as a policy.

In a meeting with the Jewish Agency's Board of Trustees at the Sheraton Plaza in Jerusalem, Mofaz said "the Palestinian Authority has turned into a terrorist entity. The terrorist attacks against us are not only being carried out by unofficial bodies, but official levels are also playing an active part."

Mofaz gave an overview of the violent events of the five months of the Al-Aksa Intifadah. He said a significant escalation in violence has been evident in the last four weeks and believes it is the Palestinians' way of presenting a challenge to the new Israeli government and trying to draw other countries into the uprising.

The chief of staff gave three principal reasons for the continuing violence:

- Official Palestinian bodies and individuals joining in the uprising
- Incitement against Israel and the Israel Defense Forces
- The harsh conditions in the territories.

Mofaz said the Palestinian leadership must now take a strategic decision to reduce the level of violence. He said the PA has broken all agreements it signed with Israel since 1993 and has stockpiled anti-tank missiles, large quantities of ammunition and other weaponry, all of which are now being turned on Israel.

Finding a place in the Orthodox world

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — When 1,500 modern Orthodox Jews gathered to affirm their distinctive identity in 1999, one author described it as the day modern Orthodoxy "climbed back up from its knees."

But last month, as 1,100 people gathered in New York for the second biennial conference of Edah, a group whose motto is "the courage to be modern and Orthodox," it was not clear just how far the liberal wing of American Orthodoxy had climbed.

Edah was formed largely out of concern that Orthodoxy had become dominated by right-wing and separatist elements and that modern Orthodox Jews – who embraced secular as well as Jewish learning, who supported Jewish pluralism and who wished to advance the status of women – were a timid and dying breed.

Some of this year's participants praised Edah for provoking thought, fostering a sense of community and lessening the feeling of "extinction" among modern Orthodox Jews.

"There's been a heightened consciousness of the strength of the modern Orthodox community," said Rabbi Saul Berman, Edah's director.

But others complained that modern Orthodox Jews, particularly outside Israel, still "look over the right shoulder," seeking the approval of more fervently Orthodox Jews.

Some expressed concern that Edah is not growing, building enough grassroots support or making bold enough strides.

"There has to be a lot of grassroots stuff going on beyond the conference and a lot of community organizing," said Rabbi Daniel Lehmann, headmaster of the New Jewish High School of Greater Boston and a speaker at the conference.

"I'm not sure people are really understanding that," he said.

This year's conference attracted a smaller crowd and less controversy than the 1999 one.

Then, several Orthodox leaders condemned the conference, with Rabbi Moshe Tendler, a prominent Yeshiva University professor, calling Edah "outside the pale of Judaism."

This year there were no public condemnations before the conference.

Rabbi Zvi Grumet, associate principal of the Torah Academy of Bergen County in New Jersey and a member of Edah's advisory board, interpreted that silence as an "acceptance that Edah and what it stands for is real, exists and is not a threat to anyone."

But Tendler, reached by telephone after the conference, said his criticism "is only sharper today."

Asserting that modern Orthodoxy is an "oxymoron," Tendler said his main objection to Edah is that its leaders confer "legitimacy" on the non-Orthodox streams of Judaism.

He also criticized many Edah leaders' support for prayer groups in which women read from the Torah, something he said violates Jewish law.

Titled "The Quest for Holiness," this year's Edah conference focused more on spirituality and ethics than the more controversial issues taken on last time.

The conference also included sessions on Orthodox feminism and the future of women's prayer groups.

But the mood in the prayer groups session was gloomy, with several women lamenting the hostility such groups have faced from rabbis as well as the apathy the groups seem to face from younger women.

Some plenary speakers, like Moshe Kaveh, president of Israel's Bar-Ilan University, endorsed liberal and controversial moves, such as allowing women to be judges on certain halachic matters and allowing marriages to be annulled in cases where recalcitrant husbands refuse their wives a Jewish divorce.

Those suggestions were greeted with a smattering of applause, but did not receive a groundswell of support.

For the most part, participants felt that – with the exception of a new modern Orthodox rabbinic seminary and the creation of Edah's online scholarly journal – little has changed among Edah's adherents in the past two years.

Lehmann urged Edah to do such things as create new prayer books and establish leadership training programs for young people that reflect the movement's ideology.

But asked whether there are enough people to support such projects, Lehmann said he did not know.

Mark Charendoff, vice president of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies and a speaker at the conference, also called for those involved to be more proactive and less concerned about criticisms from the haredi community.

"I don't want to apologize to haredim that women in my synagogue take a more active role – I want to celebrate it," he said.

While some were impatient with the lack of on-the-ground progress in championing the cause, others said the movement's focus on spirituality was an important way of dispelling criticisms that its ideology is simply a religiously diluted version of fervent Orthodoxy.

Naomi Mark, a psychologist who led a conference session on "ethical challenges in mental health practice," said in an interview that when she was growing up she went through a phase of preferring haredi Judaism because "of the passion and the excitement that modern Orthodoxy didn't seem to have."

By focusing on ethical issues, said Mark, Edah is creating "a movement where there is a passion."

Saddam, champion of intifadah

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — While U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell was journeying across the Middle East trying to shore up support for sanctions on Iraq, a look at the West Bank and Gaza Strip could have shown him how popular Saddam Hussein has become to many ordinary Arabs.

And nowhere in the Middle East does Hussein enjoy so much popularity as in the West Bank and Gaza, perhaps not even in his own country.

As Powell shuttled between Middle Eastern capitals, Palestinian demonstrators took to the streets waving Iraqi and Palestinian flags. Through megaphones, they urged Powell to go home "and tell the killer" President Bush "that our people will not kneel and will continue to fight."

Similar demonstrations were held in Amman and Beirut. Since the 1950s heyday of Egyptian President Gamal Nasser, it appears, no leader has managed to focus the Arab masses' anti-American frenzy as has Saddam Hussein.

Attempting for a decade to throw off United Nations sanctions and defy Western attempts to destroy his military machine, Hussein has found the perfect vehicle in the Palestinians' recent intifadah.

While more moderate Arab leaders like Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordanian King Abdullah dampen talk of war, Hussein – unfettered by the politesse of an international community that largely shuns him – has been trying to whip up Arab support for a broad attack to eradicate the "Zionist entity."

In a show of force meant to intimidate Israel, Hussein moved troops several times this winter to the border with Syria. Ranks of volunteers were formed to join a jihad against Israel.

Lionized in the Arab world for his missile attacks on Tel Aviv during the 1991 Gulf War, Hussein threatened to fire a Scud a day on Israel. He urged Arab leaders, whom he called too cowardly to take up arms, to make room for his army to pass on the way to liberate Palestine.

Most practically, at a time when the Palestinian Authority is unable to pay salaries and its cheques to families of intifadah "martyrs" are bouncing, Hussein is diverting funds from his own beleaguered nation to pay $10,000 to the family of each Palestinian killed fighting Israel.

With public support for PA President Yasser Arafat falling – one recent opinion poll showed that only 35 percent of Palestinians still support him – Hussein is emerging as the Palestinians' new hero.

Other Arab states have failed to deliver on their pledges of financial support for the Palestinian uprising, primarily because of fears of rampant corruption in the PA. Iraq, however, is believed to have funnelled almost $1 billion to the Palestinians.

Hussein is also believed to have supplied the PLO with rocket-propelled grenades, anti-tank missile launchers and Russian-made anti-aircraft guns. Such grenades struck a Jewish settlement in the Gaza Strip last week.

In addition, Hussein hosted Arafat advisers in January, ostensibly to discuss Iraqi support for the Palestinian uprising. In fact, according to Jane's Foreign Report, the real purpose was to explore the possibility of evacuating the senior Palestinian leadership to Baghdad if the conflict with Israel heats up.

Just as the Palestinians need Hussein, so, too, he needs them. Heating up the region serves his purposes, because Arab anger at Israel gives cover to his re-armament efforts.

Just as he did after the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait – when he said he would withdraw his occupation forces only if Israel were forced to evacuate the West Bank and Gaza Strip – Hussein is trying to establish a link between his growing standoff with the Bush administration and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Last week, for example, Iraqi officials said they would allow UN arms inspectors to return to Iraq only if they inspected Israeli facilities as well.

Iraqi Jews — preserving rich heritage

By SHARON KANON
WZPS

It is hard to imagine what it must have been like to take a stroll down a street in Baghdad, or sit on the shores of the Tigris or the Euphrates. It is also hard to imagine that Iraq, formerly Babylon, was once home to a flourishing and fiercely Zionistic Jewish community – the largest Jewish community in the world – with a highly developed network of educational, religious and cultural institutions.

An excellent way to experience the drama of the first Diaspora and recapture the vitality and charm of the large Jewish Quarter in Baghdad 50 years ago, is to visit the Baylonian Jewish Heritage Centre, located in Or Yehuda near the site of Israel's first transit camp.

A replica of a street in the Jewish Quarter includes a typical coffeehouse, and shops belonging to a silversmith, a goldsmith, a cloth merchant, an embroiderer, a shoemaker and a spice dealer. At the end of the street is a reconstruction of the Great Synagogue of Baghdad (one of 60 synagogues in Baghdad in the mid-20th century), which at the beginning of the 20th century contained more than 70 gold and silver-encased Torah scrolls.

The heritage centre recently organized its first event to attract the children of Iraqi Jewish immigrants to Israel and increase awareness of their cultural and historical roots. Laughter and tasty ethnic food were the irresistible inducements, drawing more than 200 young Israelis of Iraqi descent and their spouses to an hour-long performance highlighting the changes in family life in Israel in the '50s and '60s.

Platters of delicious kuba, sambusak (a crisp pancake filled with pureed chickpeas), bebe (a cookie with dates) and halqun (Turkish delight – sugar-coated squares containing hazelnuts, gelatin and rosewater) were served with wine, while a comedienne impersonating an old-fashioned new immigrant Iraqi mother scolding her teenage daughter in typical fashion had the audience roaring with laughter: "It's shameful. A girl can't go out alone."

Over 120,000 Iraqi Jews immigrated to Israel in operations Ezra and Nehemia, co-ordinated by the Jewish Agency between 1950 and 1952. The en masse return of the oldest Jewish Diaspora brought with it traditions from centuries of flourishing culture, which had evolved over a period of 2,000 years. Rich in history, song, folklore, customs and dress, and infused with a strong Zionist spirit, the Iraqi-Jewish legacy pulsates with life.

Walking through 2,700 years of history, the centre's museum takes visitors back to the rivers of Babylon where the Jews "sat and wept when they remembered Zion" (Psalm 137). It was from this same Fertile Crescent that Abraham emigrated.

A lovely illuminated painting in blue and white stained glass sets the scene. Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem in 598 BCE and forced his captives into exile. Among them were the teenage king of the tribe of Judah, his court, the nobility, his army, and 1,000 craftsmen and their families. Twelve years later, despite the warning of the prophet Jeremiah, the Jews rebelled, prompting the sacking of Jerusalem and the exile to Babylon of 30,000 to 40,000 additional captives.

The Jews in Babylonia held tenaciously to their identity, yet, at the same time, managed to establish a comfortable way of life. Many faced a dilemma when Cyrus the Great of Persia conquered Babylonia in 539 BCE and decreed that the Jews could go back to Jerusalem and rebuild the Temple. More than 42,000 returned with Ezra. Those who stayed sent financial support.

After the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, Babylonian Jewry became the spiritual centre for far-flung Jewish communities. Great academies of learning were established at Nechardea, Sura and Pumpedita, headed by outstanding geonim (literally excellencies, the leaders of the academies). (The museum houses a diorama of an academy.) The Babylonian Talmud, or Oral Law – the basis of Jewish law, philosophy and the Jewish way of life, was produced by Babylonian Jews.

The golden age of the geonim paralleled the days of splendour of the Arab caliphate (mid-seventh century to mid-11th century). For over a thousand years, the Jews had their own administrative head, the exilarch or rosh galuta, who at one point governed more than two million Jews.

To make the past come alive for the young Iraqi descendants at the heritage centre, live actors and actresses in traditional dress dramatized personal roles in the saga. Dressed in a turban and robe typical of a scholar, one actor took the part of a Babylonian Jew who recalled that his grandfather had brought ashes from the Temple in Jerusalem in a sack.

Tolerance and tyranny were the lot of Iraqi Jews after the Middle East Ages. During the Mongol period (13th to 15th centuries), the larger yeshivot were closed down. But by the end of the 18th century, Baghdad had once again become a centre of learning.

By the 19th century, Jews controlled Iraq's commerce and exerted influence in government circles, and as early as 1919, got on the Zionist bandwagon. In addition to Zionist organizations, the community had active sports clubs, teams and parades. A topographical replica of the Jewish Quarter of Baghdad in 1948 shows more than 60 institutes – yeshivot, schools, synagogues, medical institutions and administrative bodies.

Tradition played a major role in the life of Iraqi Jews. In the Life Cycle section of the museum, one can see examples of jewelry for babies, which was used to ward off evil spirits. These include jinijel, (usually gold) anklets with hanging bells – also useful for tracking a crawling baby, and an amulet chain (slahli) comprising several amulets, which was worn by the child like a weapon from the age of one month at an angle from the shoulder to the waist.

A renowned Iraqi marriage broker dramatized his traditional vital role in the betrothal process, lamenting that many dispensed with his services when the Jewish Agency came in and started teaching Hebrew and the horah. Dancing the horah together, he claimed, provided young men and women with the opportunity to make their own matches.

File photo of Mordechai Ben Porat speaking to community leaders in Baghdad in 1948 before the Jews started to leave.

Systematic persecution of the Jews throughout history by the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Arabs, Mongolians and Turks, as well as by the Iraqi government, which peaked with the Shavuot riots in June 1941, gave impetus to the underground movement of ardent Zionists and their dramatic en masse exodus in operations Ezra and Nehemia.

Even if you don't get a chance to feast on typical Iraqi Jewish delicacies, it is well worth a stroll through the Babylonian Jewry Heritage Centre to learn more about the oldest and most resilient of Diaspora communities.

A Case of Mistaken Identity: Ruth Gruber, an American freelance journalist based in Italy, is well known as a contributor to the New York Times, the CBC and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, and for her books on Jewish heritage in post-war Europe, including Jewish Heritage Travel: A Guide to East Central Europe (Jason Aronson, Inc., 1999).

Despite her best efforts, people still often mistake her for the other Ruth Gruber, the distinguished World War II-era journalist and author whose story was told recently in Haven on TV.

"When Ruth and I get together, as we did last year, we sit and trade stories and laugh about it," the Rome-based Ruth Gruber said recently.

Gruber was not laughing, however, after a recent exchange with a representative from the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, who had tracked her down to invite her to speak at the Jewish Book Month next November. Although she had spoken there previously, she was still suspicious that he was seeking the other Ruth Gruber instead.

"I asked him right away if he was sure that I was the Ruth Gruber he wanted, and he assured me that I was," she says. "He said he had even called my brother in Syracuse, who also went through this ID question with him. He was sure I was the right one. He assured me they knew of my work, and he seemed enthusiastic about my new book, Virtually Jewish (coming out in the fall with University of California Press).

"That clarified, I accepted the invitation," she says, adding that fees and arrangements were also discussed. Unfortunately, her initial suspicions proved well-founded. In late February, citing a mix-up in identity, the official cancelled the engagement, simultaneously offering a personal apology and the possibility of a future booking.

Gruber admits she was miffed. "To track me down in Italy, to speak to my brother, to certify that I was indeed the speaker they wanted, to talk fees and arrangements and then turn around and say 'oops' does not speak at all well for that institution," she says.

Film series highlights 1,000 years of Yiddish

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A film series called The Golden Age of Yiddish Cinema in Poland in 1937 is the latest offering of Congregation Beth Tikvah, which is celebrating 1,000 years of Yiddish.

"This is our contribution to a knowledge of our roots, of becoming a whole Jew," said Heather Shapero, immediate past president of the synagogue.

About 250 people have come to the synagogue for the Yiddish film series, which ends March 18 at 7 p.m. (admission is free, as in all the programs), with a showing of The Jolly Paupers, starring the inimitable comedy team of Dzigan and Shumacher.

"We have a relatively young membership and we thought this was a way for them to become familiar with their Yiddish roots," said Shapero, who with Gerald Zeidenberg and Raizie Jacobson headed up the committee.

The costs for the film series were underwritten by the two children and six grandchildren of synagogue members Katie and Joseph Klasner, in honour of their grandparents.

"I've seen these films many times and always they remind me of my childhood," said Joseph Klasner, 72, who came to Canada at the age of 11. He was recently honoured in Ottawa as a Holocaust survivor.

"Most of our members do not speak Yiddish but about half the audience for the films do," said Shapero, whose father, Rubin Frankel (recently retired at age 91), had his three children read and understand the headlines in a Yiddish daily. "As a result, I can read Yiddish, but I speak it only a little," she added.

"I believe the popularity of the films is partly due to the interest in 1,000 years of Yiddish." Some Beth Tikvah members are also attending Yiddish classes sponsored by UJA FEDERATION, she said.

"I think the popularity of the Beth Tikvah film series is due in part to the revival of Yiddish, and also I think the timing is right," said Shlomo Schwartzberg, a Toronto Jewish film director, who serves as guest host to introduce the films and answer questions.

"Although a number of characters in them are stereotypes, this is the way Jews saw themselves, unvarnished and as they were in real life. Certainly the films were made for a Jewish audience," Schwartzberg said.

Teen actress gets royal treatment at Disney World

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At 14, Lauren Collins has a list of acting credits that rivals many a seasoned veteran.

The unaffected Grade 9 student at Thornlea Secondary School has co-starred with a who's who from the world of entertainment.

Currently, Collins can be seen playing Brooke on the new Disney series, In A Heartbeat on the Family Channel, Sunday's at 8:30 p.m.

"The show is about teens saving lives by volunteering as emergency medical technicians at an emergency medical station," explains Collins. "I play a younger sister who helps out at the station."

Lauren Collins

Recently, Collins was flown down to Disney World and honoured at a ceremony where she placed her hands in cement outside Graumann's Chinese Theatre at the MGM Studios. The event was capped off with a motorcade ride, in which Collins was perched atop a convertible sharing the spotlight with none other than Mickey Mouse.

"It was so exciting and overwhelming, I had a great time with Mickey Mouse, even though he was not allowed to talk," she adds.

A highlight of Collins' work was when she starred as Lucy in the CBC telefilm Virtual Mom, alongside Sheila McCarthy and Debbie Reynolds.

"When Debbie Reynolds walked on set, I couldn't believe it because when I started doing musical theatre, I watched old [Reynolds'] films," Collins recalls. "I must of have seen Singin' in the Rain a million times.

"Debbie Reynolds is very funny, she looks like this sweet, innocent older lady, but she's so cutting edge," states Collins.

Another feat from her less than four years as a professional actor, was sharing a stage with Donny Osmond in Joseph & The Amazing Technicolour Dreamcoat.

Collins' has also made numerous appearances on television and in movies, including the role of Susan Lucci's daughter in the telefilm, Blood On Her Hands and a role in the movie Baby, with stars like Farrah Fawcett, Keith Carradine and Jean Stappleton.

She has appeared in a number of commercials, most recently for McDonalds and many youngsters will know her as Lindy May from the YTV series, I Was A 6th Grade Alien.

Collins' penchant for singing, dancing and acting in community theatre dates back to when she was nine.

"A teacher at my school suggested I join an after school acting group," Collins says.

"The woman running it, Shari Quallenberg… spoke to my mother about me doing professional work. At first my mother wasn't sure but after some convincing, I started professional acting and Shari is still my agent. She's amazing, she just saw something in me when I was in the chorus and knew my potential."

Collins continues to participate in community theatre with local groups including Quallenberg's company of players, CharActors Theatre Troupe

She will be kicking her heals in CharActors' next production, A Chorus Line on April 21st at the Yorkwoods Library.

Collins lives with her mother and father, Sari and Stan and older brother Anthony, 19. The family belongs to Beth Emeth synagogue.

Collins plans to major in theatre when she goes to university. For now, she will continue to act, although after graduating, she says there are a number of other entertainment related jobs that interest her, such as casting, writing and directing.

The teenager stays grounded by not dwelling on her acting life when out with the girls.

"The most important thing to me is to stay a real kid," she says. "My friends all know that I act because they see me on TV. I don't mind talking about it, but when I don't have to, I choose not to."

New Sherman play filled with contemporary Canadian characters

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although Jewish immigrants were cut from An Acre of Time in the expanded two-act version, Jewish playwright Jason Sherman says it is not a future omen, and he will continue to write plays about Jews, as he has in the past.

"The Jewish characters were cut, along with a number of French-Canadian ones who were not relevant to the enlarged play," he said.

An Acre of Time, based on a book by Phil Jenkins, is about the people who lived in LeBreton Flats, a real piece of land, an area as familiar to Ottawans as the Parliament Buildings just across the Ottawa River.

In real life, controversy swirls around the area, as the National Capital Commission (NCC) mulls over plans for what is now flat and unused, since its working class homes were demolished in 1965.

"This is a play about the memory of Julia, a surveyor," Sherman said. "We're not taking on the NCC over LeBreton Flats. The main characters are not NCC wonks [policy makers]. I understand that right now a plan for mixed use – homes and office buildings – is in favour, but that's not the point of the play."

Julia is assigned to the job, and she does go there, but she doesn't want to, because she has horrible memories of a fateful camping trip on the flats, from which her daughter never returned. She has fantasies, including a vision of Samuel de Champlain who first recorded the location in 1613, when he was trying to find a spice route to the Far East.

The play includes aboriginals who once lived there; early settlers; the original 18th-century surveyor, John Stegmann; its first expropriator, Lord Dalhousie; and merchants and

A vibrant Jewish community in a delightful city

Savannah synagogue is the oldest Reform congregation in America

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

SAVANNAH, Ga. — For a city with a total Jewish population of only 3,000, Savannah has an extremely well organized and active Jewish community.

When I contacted the local Jewish Educational Alliance to enquire about "things Jewish" that might be of interest, I was referred to local tour guide Sharon Galin, a retired educator with a great love of her adopted city. Having moved to Savannah over 40 years ago from her native Atlanta, Galin specializes in showing visitors the city's Jewish historical sites.

Before my "official" tour of the city, however, Galin invited me to accompany her to her synagogue, an invitation I happily accepted. We attended services at Agudath Achim, a Conservative congregation, where I was struck both by a feeling of familiarity and by the congregation's particularly Southern twist.

The members were warm and friendly with faces and names that one could find in any congregation in North America. The service was the same, the melodies familiar. When the rabbi spoke, however, it wasn't about the weekly Torah portion or about events in Israel. He spoke of something newsworthy and important to his local congregation: the controversy about whether to continue flying the Confederate flag on public buildings in spite of the opposition of Georgia's Black community.

At the kiddush following services, I listened as people reminisced about their experiences growing up while segregation was still legal. The conversation brought to life a subject I had only read about before.

Savannah also boasts two other active congregations: B'nai Brith Jacob, an Orthodox congregation, and Mickve Israel, a Reform congregation.

Mickve Israel was the first congregation established in the South and is also the oldest congregation in America now practising Reform Judaism. It is also the third oldest congregation in America, following New York's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue and Touro Synagogue in Newport, Rhode Island.

In 1733, when English settlers established the colony of Georgia, 42 Jews of Spanish, Portuguese and German descent arrived by ship and formed the nucleus of what was to become a thriving and ongoing congregation.

In 1876, after meeting in various buildings over the years, the congregation built the present synagogue, believed to be the only synagogue of English Gothic architecture in the country.

In the synagogue's museum, one can see photographs, artifacts and letters of historic significance, including the original Torah, written on deerskin, which was brought with the settlers in 1733.

In addition to its three synagogues, Savannah has a Glatt Kosher retirement residence known as Buckingham South where, I am told, a visitor could arrange to have a kosher meal. The city also has a Jewish day school, the Rambam School, and an afternoon school shared by the Orthodox and Conservative congregations. A very large and beautiful Jewish community centre, called the Jewish Educational Alliance, boasts an indoor pool and other modern facilities.

Savannah also offers many delightful and interesting sites for history buffs. The historic section of the city, beginning with River Street along the banks of the Savannah river, is easy to walk. The city is organized around town squares as in the original plans and can be easily navigated with a city map.

Buses and trolley tours take visitors to see such sites as the Juliette Gordon Low House (named after the founder of the Girl Guides of America) as well as the Mercer House, the home of Jim Williams made famous by the book and subsequent film, Midnight in the Garden of Good & Evil.

Easily accessible for anyone travelling south to Florida by car and perfect for lovers of warm weather and beautiful scenery and new places to explore, Savannah is certainly worth the trip.

A debate between left and right at the heart of Clout

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "My central belief is that people who own the world should govern it," says arrogant right-wing newspaper magnate, Lionel K. Biggar, a caricature version of Conrad Black in Clout, the Necessary Angel Theatre production directed by Richard Rose.

There is no doubt that playwright David Young had Black in mind, but a more interesting question is why Clout chooses to make the left-wing journalist, Trent, the fall guy in this drama.

Theatregoers who expect Biggar to be taken down a peg or two will be disappointed, but highly entertained, by R.H. Thomson's portrayal. If anything, Biggar comes off best in the debate between left and right, which is at the heart of the play.

Both Thomson and Eric Peterson (Trent) do their parts well, and their arguments, both physical and verbal, with their relevance to Canadian situations, make good theatre. Initially, Trent, a cancer patient and morphine addict, seems to be winning, but in the end Biggar outlasts and outwits him, getting most of the good lines, such as, "My definition of a loser is some one who is born at third base and thinks he's hit a triple to get there."

Those who want to hear a case made for right or left in Canadian politics will get a lot to chew over, though the writer's views come through strongly, namely that the left, at least in Trent's case, comes off second best.

Trent is pictured as a hypocrite. While professing alarm at society's ills and prescribing socialism as a cure, he is himself a philanderer who got a woman pregnant while at university and ran away from his responsibilities.

To add zest to the debate, the playwright introduces an eco-terrorist (Waneta Storms), who kidnaps Biggar and Trent, lasers them into submission, and handcuffs them together so that they can continue to argue.

In the course of the drama, she becomes Renee, the student whom both Biggar and Trent crave; Eve, a nurse Trent wants to seduce; and also the daughter Trent left behind.

Playwright Young ties the left-right debate and the different stations in life of Biggar and Trent to their rivalry over Renee, which is climaxed by a hilarious scene in which the magnate delays making love "because I need to tidy up a little."

I believe Clout's author went off the deep end in his ghoulish portrayal of Trent and the whippings Trent gave to Biggar during their imprisonment, violence that Biggar answered in kind.

Clout, a co-production with the National Arts Centre in Ottawa where the play was staged first, runs at the Factory Theatre until March 25.

Comedian may get his own series

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Comic Michael Gelbart, 31, isn't just a stand up – he sits down to write his wit, and runs around diligently signing contracts to bring his total entertainment package to the public.

A taste of his talents can be seen in a new half-hour network television special Comedy Now, airing at 9 p.m. on March 11th on The Comedy Network and at 10 p.m. April 7th on CTV.

So impressed are the folks at The Comedy Network, that even before his latest special airs, there have been talks with the Montreal-born, Toronto-based single comic about developing his own 13-week series.

After a six month self-imposed hiatus from stand up, Gelbart was summoned to Toronto's Masonic Temple to tape his special, which contained original material, most of it never before heard or even tried out in a club – unheard of in comedy and very bold on his part.

"I started off earlier in my career talking about pop culture. Then I developed self-confidence to speak more about my thoughts, rather than focusing on shallow things. My act is constantly changing and evolving. I'm trying to make my act more about human behaviour and hope it inspires people to think. A lot of my material requires abstract thought."

Gelbart's fresh approach to his craft was recently enhanced by a trip to Asia. "I was taking the appreciation of my career for granted and then when I got to this Buddhist meditation retreat in Thailand, I took an 11 day vow of silence – no talking, reading or listening to music.

"When the monks would give a serious talk on meditation and touch on anything funny, everyone there would burst out laughing. That made me realise how important it is to be able to make people laugh."

Gelbart moved to Toronto with his family as a teen. While attending Thornlea Secondary School in Thornhill, he began doing comedy as an outlet for his creativity. Most of his teachers laughed at his humour and encouraged him to pursue it.

In fact, over 50 classmates attended his premiere amateur night performance at a Toronto comedy club. "I continued to go to amateur nights at comedy clubs and worked as a comic throughout college on weekends. It allowed me to buy a convertible while still in school, and I did not have to bother my parents for money."

At Seneca College, Gelbart studied broadcasting, but did not want to be delegated to a career as a weatherman broadcasting from a small market television.

Instead, he continued to work the clubs. In 1996, just as he was considering a career move to law, the CBC invited him to write and star in his first network television special as part of their series Comics.

Michael Gelbart

"After the special, I started acting in movies-of-the-week filmed in Vancouver, but didn't enjoy them because I was never given a chance to have an opinion on anything. I divided my time with contracts that I got as a result of my stand-up material. This allowed me to contribute opinions."

As a writer, Gelbart has penned three Gemini Awards broadcasts and a number of programs for CBC, YTV, Life Network and Fox Family Channel. He has also produced, written and hosted two new Internet infotainment specials Make It Funny and Comedy Clinic available at tvradio.com and www.michaelgelbart.com.

Gelbart plans to move to New York to continue his work as a stand up comedian and comedy writer on a much broader scale. He hopes this career move will evolve into producing and appearing on his own show south of the border.

While in the United States, he'll be shopping around two of his film scripts, one of which as already had option offers in Canada.

"I get to do a lot of cool things in my career – appear on network specials, be on movie sets, write award shows or perform in the clubs," he says.

"To make people laugh is great. So far, the writing has been the most lucrative, but if not for stand up, I don't think I would have the opportunity to do all these other things.

"Stand up has helped me stand out. I know a lot of unemployed writers and a lot of unemployed actors. I've never been either of the two and it's directly because of stand up. It has been an excellent advertisement for what I'm capable of doing."

Acre of Time is filled with characters you can identify with traders and generations of citizens. Cast members play multiple roles.

You don't have to be from Ottawa to enjoy the play, says Sherman, any more than you have to be living in Moscow to enjoy the play Three Sisters.

An Acre of Time is filled with contemporary characters in Canadian history that most people will identify with and enjoy. Sherman has made a name for himself in Canadian theatre, having written The League of Nathans, Reading Hebron, Three in the Back, Two in the Head, The Retreat, Patience and It's All True.

He won both the Governor General's Literary Award and the Chalmers Award. A collection of six of his plays is due shortly from Playwrights Canada Press.

The author gives credit to Jenkins, a bon vivant and storyteller in Ottawa, for inspiring him to write the play. Jenkins, when he isn't writing about Canadian history, is a tour guide for LeBreton Flats.

"I've talked to him many times. He is so well known in Ottawa that people have stopped to talk to him when we're walking together. He liked the first production by the Great Canadian Theatre in Ottawa last May which ran for three weeks and did sold-out business."

An Acre of Time was originally commissioned by Brian Quirt's Nightswimming. It opens at Tarragon Theatre on March 13 and closes on April 15. Previews begin on March 7.

Eating disorders explored at Israeli conference

JERUSALEM — How does one explain that humans are the only living creatures who starve themselves to death voluntarily?

That is the challenge that faces researchers and medical practitioners in trying to cope with eating disorders – deviance from normal eating to the point of death in extreme cases.

A national Israeli eating disorder conference, sponsored by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem faculty of medicine, the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and Hadassah University Hospital and supported by the Canada-Israel Institute for Sports and Health Education, was held this week at the Hebrew University to delve into the latest findings relating to the causes, prevention and treatment of various forms of eating disorders.

The conference featured leading specialists in the field, mainly from Canada and Israel. Conducted in both Hebrew and English, it met under the theme: "From the Classroom to the Clinic: Education, Intervention and Prevention."

Statistics vary, but anorexia, a form of self-starvation, is thought to affect between 1 to 2 percent of all teenage girls worldwide. Bulimia (bingeing and purging), which tends to affect people from the late teens on, may affect as many as one in six students. Overall, it is believed that more than 50 percent of all teenagers experience some form of eating disorder through their maturing years.

Israel is not exempt from this problem. Experts say that eating disorders are rising sharply among Israeli teenage girls, but awareness and treatment of the condition is far less developed than in North America. A study conducted in the mid-1990s indicated that the hospitalization rate for anorexia in Israel is 29 patients per 100,000 people, similar to the figure in the United States.

Prof. Elliot M. Berry of the Hebrew University-Hadassah medical school and the department of human nutrition and metabolism at the Braun Hebrew University-Hadassah school of public health and community medicine, was chair of the organizing committee for the conference.

Berry has developed a hypothesis, based on experiments with food-deprived mice, that when essential amino acids and fatty acids are missing from the diet because of excessive undereating, brain function is affected to the extent that normal behaviour is disrupted. This leads to the assumption that people who begin voluntary starvation may become irrational in relating to normal eating or in the way they perceive their own bodies.

The solution could be to administer the missing acids to patients as a preliminary step to psychological rehabilitation. This becomes complicated, however, because of the patients' refusal to accept such treatment. Anorexics, apparently, do receive some compensation instead of food.

Under conditions of semi-starvation, the body produces substances that might cause an "altered state" or "high" enabling anorexics to put up with such feelings as hunger and cold in a manner differently than under normal conditions.

Socio-cultural factors are also considered an important element, particularly in the initial stages of eating disorders. Especially affected are girls and young women who are subjected to societal pressures extolling the pursuit of thinness. These factors are also being studied, Berry said.

It is essential to raise the awareness of eating disorders through education, particularly among young women, "in order to prevent their self-destruction," Berry says.

Among the guest lecturers were Dr. Paul Garfinkel, chair of the psychiatry department at the University of Toronto; Dr. Allan Kaplan, head of the program for eating disorders at Toronto General Hospital; and Dr. Marsha Marcus, head of the behavioural medicine and eating disorders program at the University of Pittsburgh school of medicine.

Heart disease affects women

The symptoms of heart disease and the signs of a heart attack are different. In addition, women's experiences with heart disease can differ from men's. The Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada is urging both men and women to study the warning signs and take quick action.

Heart disease and stroke is the number one cause of death for Canadian women, causing four out of every 10 deaths. Eight times more women die from heart disease and stroke than from breast cancer.

Women may be more likely to experience "atypical" symptoms such as vague chest discomfort. Some risk factors such as hormones and diabetes can significantly increase the risk of heart attack among women. Some diagnostic tests and treatments for heart attack may not work as well on women.

In the past, heart disease among women was not treated as aggressively as men and fewer women were referred for treatments such as bypass surgery and balloon angioplasty following a heart attack.

Early warning signs of heart disease in women

If you experience any of these feelings, seek medical advice.

- Pain or discomfort in the chest that comes on with physical activity and goes away with rest.
- Shortness of breath, breathlessness, or unusual tiredness with physical activity.
- Physical activities that used to be easy or normal have become difficult.

Warning signs of heart attack in women

If you experience any of these feelings, tell someone right away or call for emergency help.

- Vague chest tightness, discomfort, pain or a crushing radiating chest pain.
- Heaviness, pressure, squeezing, fullness, burning or pain that may begin in the centre of the chest and spread to the neck, jaws and shoulder.
- Unusual pain that spreads down one or both arms.
- Shortness of breath, paleness, sweating or weakness.
- Nausea, vomiting and/or indigestion.
- Feelings of extreme anxiety, fear and/or denial.

Moms hit the ice in Thursday morning ritual

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — She shoots, she scores!

It's become a Thursday morning ritual. After seeing their husbands and kids off to work and school, approximately 22 women dash over to Forest Hill Arena where they don skates and pads for a vigorous workout followed by a game.

Officially called the Mothers Hockey League, or MHL for short (although you don't have to be a mother to join), the four-year-old league is the brainchild of Susan Leston.

"At the time, everyone in my household was playing hockey, even my daughter," she said. "I was actually with a couple of women when I said I wouldn't mind playing some hockey."

The first step towards making her vision a reality was recruiting teammates, women bold enough to take on an adventure by learning to play a new game.

"We put up ads all over the Eglinton area," Leston said.

The response was overwhelming. Many of the women, who at first were apprehensive, have now become addicted to the sport.

"Some of the women who have never played before are now playing twice a week," she said. "Some even rearrange their work schedule so that they can always play on Thursday mornings."

The regime calls for the women to take to the ice every Thursday morning at 9:30 for a half-hour lesson in hockey fundamentals under the supervision of a qualified instructor.

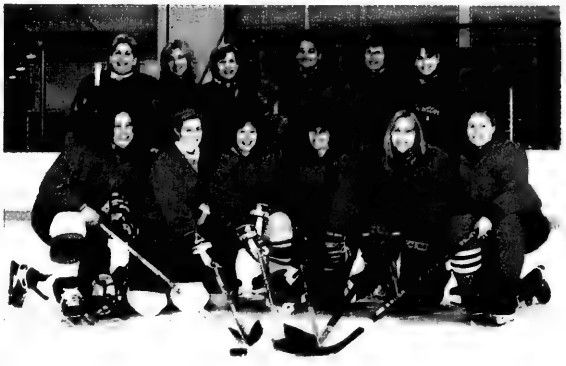
"We learn something different every week. We work on skating, stick handling and shooting the puck. We hired the instructor, who works with us every week before we play our games and then acts as referee during the game," Leston said.

Once the clock strikes 10, it's time to put those new skills to the test as the puck drops at centre ice for a game.

Red and blue teams were set early in the season and the two squads have built a friendly rivalry.

"We play 22 games in a season; 11 before Chanukah and 11 after. We never keep score. The purpose is to have fun and to get some exercise. We have a full program right now. We decided to cut off enrolment early this year to make sure that the women got sufficient ice time," Leston said.

An exception, however, is allowed for goaltenders, who are in short supply. Although the MHL would prefer experienced netminders, beginners are also welcome.



Ruth Garbe (left, above) and Joanne Esakov face off prior to joining the rest of the MHL for a pre-practice photo.

Although the season concludes at the end of March, the MHL is considering a spring and summer activity. In early June, Forest Hill Arena is turned into a roller blade facility and there is talk in the MHL of forming a spring and summer rollerblading league.

One veteran member who has benefited greatly from this hockey program is Jane Rendely.

"I feel more fit," she said. "Watching my son have so much fun on the ice inspired me to play."

At the end of the season, the women, who have battled each other for weeks on the ice, get together for an end of the year banquet.

These women have proved that if there is something you really want to try, you never know what might happen.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I have gone to summer camp for many years and enjoyed it very much. This summer, most of my friends are going back to camp. My parents would prefer me to stay in the city and attend summer school. I am not a strong student and they think next year will be easier for me if I have a smaller number of classes during the school year. I understand their logic, but I know how much I would miss camp and my friends. Do you have any advice?

Uncertain

Dear Uncertain,

It is very important for you to determine how badly you want to go back to camp. If it is absolutely necessary for you because you feel as though you will be missing a very important and enlightening experience, you should sit down with your parents and rationally explain to them how much this means to you.

It is very important that you approach your parents maturely, because if you whine and complain, they won't take you seriously. If you plan out your argument before you sit down with them, they will know you are serious about this.

On the other hand, it may be beneficial for you to take classes during the summer. It will make your work a lot easier next year, enabling you to do better and have a more relaxed school year.

Staying in the city during the summer is not always bad. If you are here this summer, I'm sure you'll find a lot of fun things to do and people to be with.

Although it will be hard not to be with your camp friends, you can still stay just as close to all of them, by writing and visiting. You may even feel closer to them after not spending the summer with them because, after all, "absence makes the heart grow fonder."

If you are in the city for the summer, not only will you be able to maintain those friendships, but you will also be able to make new friends.

This situation seems very unfair right now, but your parents just want what's best for you. So, even though this might be hard, try to make the best of the situation and look at the positive effect it could have on you.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Israel's new prime minister

After a month of coalition bargaining, Ariel Sharon's unity government was approved last week in the Knesset by a vote of 72 to 21. Six parties comprise the government. The Knesset also voted to repeal direct elections for prime minister. [Israel photo]

CJC names executive

TORONTO — Keith Landy, current chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, has been acclaimed incoming national president of CJC, Goldie Hershon, chair of the CJC nominations committee and a former CJC president has announced.

At the close of the nominations deadline on March 7, there was also a full slate of national officers, Hershon said.

"I am pleased now to officially confirm that this slate will be the final one presented to the upcoming CJC plenary assembly to be held at the Inn on the Park in Toronto on May 6 and 7.

"Congratulations to Keith Landy as the incoming president, and to his new officers, who will lead the organization that is the Jewish community's national voice on public affairs. I am confident that CJC can look forward to continued effective representation of the Jewish community of Canada in the 21st century," said Hershon.

Landy, born in England and raised in South Africa, is a senior partner in the Toronto law firm of Landy, Marr and Associates. He will succeed Moshe Ronen as president of CJC at the close of the plenary.

'Zionism is racism' resurfaces

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is not ruling out boycotting a controversial United Nations conference on racism that is threatening to resuscitate the Zionism-equals-racism issue.

A Foreign Affairs Canada official was careful last week to counter what he said was a media report that misrepresented the government's stand.

The report stated that Canada would attend the conference in Durban, South Africa, in August even if it was clear the Zionism issue would be up for debate.

"No decision has been taken yet," stressed François Lasalle. "We have to evaluate everything."

Canada may boycott UN 'polemic fest'

Canada's "general policy," Lasalle told The CJN, is that boycotts, like sanctions, "are not always the best way to go.

"But at this point, we are not discounting anything, including the option of not attending."

In the meantime, Canada will work to influence the conference's agenda as much as possible. "Our position is that we oppose any efforts to reintroduce Zionism-is-racism into any forum, whether it's the UN or otherwise," Lasalle said. "We act on that core position."

The Zionism debate is already threatening to derail the UN World Conference Against Racism. The U.S. State Department said recently there is a good chance it will boycott

Media Awards

TORONTO — The 26th Annual Media Human Rights Awards of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights will be presented March 19 at the Jane Mallet Theatre in Toronto. This year's recipient of the Special Media Human Rights Award is Canadian cartoonist Lynn Johnson, creator of For Better or For Worse.

Israel

Population Forecast

JERUSALEM — Palestinians will outnumber Israelis in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Strip by the year 2050, according to a recent United Nations report. The report noted that there are currently more than six million Israelis and 3.2 million Palestinians living in those areas. Because of a higher birthrate, the Palestinian population is expected to number 11.8 million by 2050, while the Israeli population is expected to be 10.1 million.

Gun Requests

JERUSALEM — Requests for gun permits have risen 300 percent in Israel since Palestinian violence erupted in late September, Israel Radio reported. The greatest increase has been in the environs of Jerusalem and around the West Bank's Ariel settlement.

Pardon Sought

JERUSALEM — A right-wing women's group has launched a petition to secure a presidential pardon for a woman convicted of complicity in the 1995 assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. Margalit Har-Shefi is set to be jailed on charges of failing to notify the authorities of her friend Yigal Amir's plan to kill Rabin. The Women in Green say Israeli officials knew of Amir's intentions in advance.

World

Community's 'Shame'

NEW YORK — Jonathan Pollard's Toronto-based wife slammed Israel and the American Jewish community for lobbying harder for a pardon for fugitive financier Marc Rich than for her husband, who is serving a life sentence for spying for Israel. Esther Pollard told a dinner here last week that the "deep involvement of the American Jewish leadership and the government of Israel" in former president Bill Clinton's rush of last-minute pardons "has become a source of embarrassment and shame for the Jewish community."

Presidential Apology

WARSAW — Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski intends to apologize on the anniversary of a wartime massacre of Jews in the small Polish town of Jedwabne. The town is the focus of a new book that details how local Poles allegedly herded up to 1,600 Jews into a barn on July 10, 1941, and then burned it down. The book has sparked national debate among Poles.

Jew Released?

TEHRAN — Iran last week released one of the 10 Iranian Jews imprisoned for allegedly spying for Israel, according to the country's state-controlled news agency. However, U.S. Jewish activists monitoring the case have been unable to confirm whether Ramin Nematizadeh was in fact released. Nematizadeh, 24, was sentenced to two years, the shortest term of the 10. Another three prisoners may soon be paroled, according to activists.

Black Lashes Out

LONDON — Canadian media magnate Conrad Black lambasted a columnist at one of his publications for an anti-Semitic column. Black, who owns the Spectator in London, wrote, in a column of his own, that Taki Theodoracopulos had issued a "blood libel" against Jews "almost worthy of Goebbels" with a piece that said, in part: "The way to Uncle Sam's heart runs through Tel Aviv and Israeli-occupied territory," and described Israelis as "those nice guys who attack rock-throwing youth with armour-piercing missiles." Black, who also owns the Jerusalem Post and half the National Post, also accused the British Foreign Ministry and major British media of endemic anti-Semitism.

Life Sentence

PARIS — The highest-ranking Nazi believed still alive has been sentenced in absentia by a French court to life in jail. The verdict against Alois Brunner was for deporting 345 Jews to Auschwitz. Brunner, believed to be living in Syria, was Adolf Eichmann's personal secretary during World War II.

Jewish Studies in Former Communist States

BUDAPEST — Jewish communities in four former Communist states have established a scholarship grant for students in Jewish studies at the Central European University (CEU) here.

"It marks the first time that Jewish communities in east-central Europe co-operate in such a way," said sociologist Andras Kovacs, director of the Jewish Studies Project at CEU.

Jewish communities in the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Hungary and Poland contributed a total of $2,000 to endow the Central and Eastern European Jewish Communities Jewish Studies Support Research Grant.

The CEU, set up in 1990, is a regional university promoting educational development and policy-making in central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Funded by the Soros Foundation, it provides post-graduate education for students from nearly 40 countries.

Anti-Israel ad angers mainstream Orthodox Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mainstream Orthodox Jews are seething over an ad that describes Zionism as "heresy" and claims that the existence of the State of Israel is a violation of the Jewish religion.

"It was very disgusting," said Rabbi Dovid Schochet, chair of the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, the city's Orthodox rabbinic council.

The ad represents "an extreme, fanatic, anti-Zionist point of view," said Rabbi Moshe Stern of Toronto's Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

"I suspect it is a perverted communiqué to the non-Jewish world to gather against the State of Israel and annihilate it," said Rabbi Chananya Berzon, president of the Rabbinical Council of Canada, Eastern region.

"I was very aggravated by the ad," said Kurt Rothschild, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation.

The ad that has so angered mainstream Jews appeared last week in the National Post and the Montreal Gazette, after appearing earlier in the New York Times. The ad was placed by the Central Rabbinical Congress of the U.S.A. & Canada and it included a contact address and phone number in Brooklyn, as well as a phone number in Montreal. A call to the New York office was directed to the Montreal branch, while requests from the Montreal office for a comment were ignored.

The ad is headed, "Why are we against the Israeli government and its wars?"

Citing a chapter of the Talmud, the ad argues that since the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple, "the Jewish people have been forbidden by the Creator to exercise sovereignty over the Holy Land prior to the Messianic era.

"For over 2,000 years, the Jewish people accepted their exile as Divine decree… Zionism by its very nature rejects the concept of a Divinely imposed exile. In addition, it has been consistently indifferent to the sufferings and dangers which it and its embodiment, the State of Israel, have inflicted upon Jew and gentile. Zionism represents a total and radical break with the beliefs and practices of the Jewish people throughout history."

The ad appears to be the work of the anti-Israel Neturei Karta, Rothschild and Rabbi Berzon said.

The group, founded in 1938, is fervently anti-Zionist and it has been embraced by Wondrous musical legatee

From the editor's desk

There is a famous archival photograph of the members of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra (IPO) – men wearing suits and women in long skirts – clustered around the sides of a bus that is stuck on an upward incline in a rock-strewn field. The orchestra members are pushing the bus forward, helping it advance along an uncertain path.

The photo was taken during a time of war, July 1948, merely weeks after the State of Israel had been declared. The bus was stuck on the famous "Burma" Road, the road to Jerusalem hastily engineered to relieve the siege of the city and bring supplies of food and water to its starving people.

It was a treacherous road travelled during treacherous times. But it was obvious in the hearts of these brave musicians that music was also desperately needed by the people of Jerusalem.

"The orchestra of this land, ever old and ever new, has before it not merely the task of aiding, by means of strengthening their cultural life, the inhabitants of Eretz Israel in the work of upbuilding; its aim should also be to prepare the ground for a musical culture, which may, should the times again be propitious, present mankind with a mighty creator of music."

Thus spoke Bronislaw Huberman, the renowned Polish-born violinist, who founded the Palestine Symphony Orchestra twelve years earlier, in December 1936, in one of the many seminal, farsighted acts involved in the re-establishment of the Jewish state. Huberman's vision ultimately became the guiding ethos of the IPO.

Despite the severe economic, social and military hardships of the early years, a musical culture did indeed arise in Israel. It flourishes there to this day.

One of these "mighty creators of music" to spring from that culture is Pinchas Zukerman.

Born in Tel Aviv in 1948, Zukerman began violin studies when he was eight years old at the Israel Conservatory and at the Academy of Music in Tel Aviv. His teacher was Ilona Feher. At the age of 14, he travelled to North America to study at the Julliard in New York. His mentors at the time were Pablo Casals and Isaac Stern. Five years later, at the age of 19, his solo career would be launched after he won first prize in the prestigious 25th Leventritt International Competition.

Pinchas Zukerman

Zukerman has been described as a musical genius. Concert publicists have written that "his prodigious technique has long been a marvel to critics and audiences, and his exceptional artistic standards continue to earn him the highest acclaim. Equally respected as a violinist, violist, conductor, pedagogue and chamber musician, Zukerman is indeed a master of our time."

Zukerman's achievements, appointments and awards are legion. Since April 1988, he has been music director of the National Arts Centre Orchestra in Ottawa. He is also artist-in-residence of the Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra, music director of the Ilona Feher Music Center in Holon, Israel and chair of the Pinchas Zukerman Performance Program at the Manhattan School of Music.

Recently, when the winds of winter froze the nighttime and the streets of downtown Toronto, Master Zukerman bestrode the stage at Roy Thomson Hall to warm the hearts of an enthusiastically appreciative audience.

As performer and conductor, Zukerman led the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in an emotional, wide-ranging performance of works by Mozart, Shostakovich and Schumann.

Along with Andrew Burashko on piano, Zukerman was the featured soloist in Mozart's Sonata for Violin and Piano in B-flat Major. His left leg fully extended and his right leg slightly flexed at the knee, Zukerman commanded the stage. The deep, full, rich tones that emanated from the knowing draws of his bow filled the hall with a pulsating, pleasurable sound. The ensuing musical "dialogue" between violin and piano was an auditory delight, a comforting, enchanting start to the evening.

Zukerman then put down the violin and picked up the baton, conducting Burashko and trumpeter Andrew McCandless as the soloists in Shostakovich's complicated Piano Concerto No. 1 in C Minor.

The concert concluded, again with Zukerman on the conductor's podium, with the full symphony magnificently performing Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major.

As the master took his final bows, the image of that archival photo of the IPO on the Burma Road popped into my mind. How happy I was to have been able to see and hear Zukerman perform. How proud I felt that so wondrous a legatee had inherited Israel's musical culture for the benefit of the entire world.

Sephardic centre evacuated in bomb scare

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The third bomb scare in as many weeks directed at Jewish institutions in the Toronto area, resulted last Thursday night in the evacuation of some 600 people from the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill, and the detonation of a suspicious package.

York Region Police evacuated the building after the congregation had just completed the reading of the Purim Megillah, and sealed off Bathurst Street just north of Steeles Avenue, after a small package was found around 9 p.m.

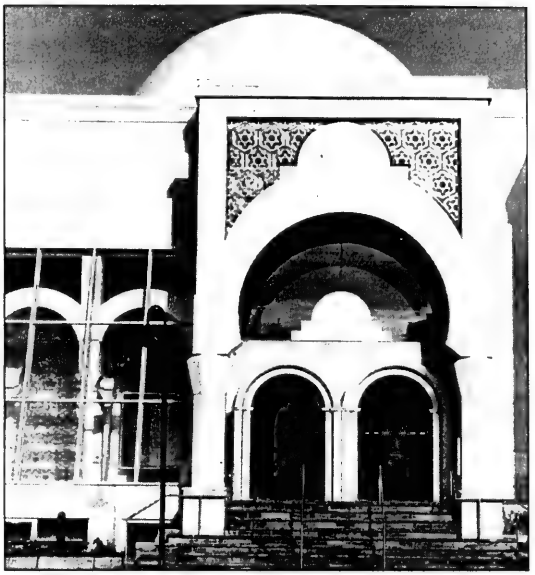
The bomb squad was called in to deal with the package, which was discovered by security guards along an outdoor wall.

York Region police described it as having wires and a battery wrapped around some pipes.

PC Armstrong of York Region's 4 Division told The CJN the package "was nothing of a threatening nature. It was just a prank."

A centre spokesperson, who declined to be identified, said the evacuation was orderly and no one was hurt. People were asked to wait in the rear of the building while the bomb squad was called.

A bomb squad robot later fired a shot into the package but nothing exploded.



The Sephardic Kehila Centre

In the past few weeks, two other bomb threats were directed at Jewish schools: one last month at the United Synagogue Day School campus at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where a sniffer dog was dispatched, and one at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). Both involved threats that were telephoned in but nothing was found in either incident.

It's not known whether the bomb scare at the Sephardic Kehila Centre was preceded by a telephone call. At the time The CJN went to press, there were no arrests.

The centre houses a synagogue, a hall, a mikvah, Ohr Haemet Sephardic School, and Zareinu, a school for students with special needs.

Rumours that the bomb scare was a Purimshpiel – a prank played on a holiday on which jokes and levity are encouraged – were downplayed by Canadian Jewish Congress.

"I would hate to think that any member of our community would have such poor taste that this would be a Purimshpiel," said Len Rudner of CJC Ontario region's community relations committee.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Rabbinic mission to Israel planned

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Toronto Board of Rabbis and the Ministry of Tourism for the State of Israel are co-sponsoring the first ever rabbinic mission to Israel.

"Our hope is to bring together as many rabbis as possible [from April 29 to May 3], from across the country and from across denominations, in a show of support for Israel, and a strategic show of support for tourism to Israel," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Although the Canadian government has approved tourism to Israel and there is no official policy warning people not to go, she said, tourism to Israel has dropped drastically.

"This decline has caused thousands upon thousands of lay-offs and hotel closings, and Israelis are feeling a critical sense of isolation," she said.

Rabbis on the five-day mission will meet with top level Israeli government officials.

"We want the rabbis to come back to their congregations with eye-witness reports and with information from the government officials. We want them to bring their congregants a hands-on-sense of what is going on in Israel."

'We want representation from all denominations'

It is also important for Israelis to see that the rabbis have organized this mission, said Rabbi Goldstein.

She arranged the mission, she said, after hearing a talk by Arie Shevy-Shibi, the Israeli Government Tourist Office's tourism director for Canada.

"He gave us the numbers. There has been a radical cut back in Jewish groups going to Israel, and I felt there was something we could do right away. I spoke to him about it, and in one day the mission was arranged."

Rabbi Goldstein has faxed letters to all members of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, Toronto rabbis who are not members, and all Reform and Conservative rabbis from across the country. "I have also made strategic contacts with Orthodox rabbis. We want representation from all denominations."

For information on the rabbinic mission to Israel call Rabbi Goldstein at 416-485-7007.

Dry Bones
WE'VE GOT THE BIGGEST GOVERNMENT WE'VE EVER HAD...
AND THE BIGGEST PRIME MINISTER WE'VE EVER HAD...
AND IT'S A GOOD THING, 'CAUSE..
WE'VE GOT THE BIGGEST PROBLEMS WE'VE EVER HAD!

Unity: an unequivocal message

Despite the public expressions of regret by some hard-core partisan ideologues within the political spectrum, the decision by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to cobble together a unity government in Jerusalem is to be highly commended.

The message it sends is unequivocal as is the need to send it.

To the people of Israel it is a source of inspiration and of confidence; to the Palestinians, it should be a signal of Israeli resolve and determination; to the people of the world, it should be proof of the vibrancy and flexibility of Israeli democracy; and to the Diaspora, an example.

In unity, we know, there can always be government. But in the unique proportional, parliamentary democracy that is Israel's government, can there be unity? That is the question whose answer will unfold over the course of the next few months. Already there are signs that "unity" will have a looser rather than a tighter definition.

Cabinet portfolios have been allocated – like precious candy among quibbling siblings – to ministers with obviously different political philosophies. Sharon, for example, has decreed there will be no negotiations with the Palestinian Authority (PA) until it stops the violence. Yet his foreign minister, Shimon Peres, draws distinctions between "negotiations" and "dialogue," the latter, presumably, not being barred by any level of Palestinian violence.

And it does not appear that the violence will end in the near future; nor does it seem that Yasser Arafat even wants it to end, assuming, that is, he has the power to bring it to an end.

Last week, Arafat addressed the Palestinian legislative council in Gaza for the first time in over five months. But he could not bring himself to publicly renounce the resort to violence. Instead, he uttered the same, non-credible, tired platitudes about his commitment to the "strategic path of peace," and then effectively contradicted himself by reemphasizing the sanctity of the Palestinian refugees' right to "return" to their homes. All Israelis – and Palestinians too – understand that as the code word for the destruction of Israel.

Arafat also called on the Sharon government to resume peace negotiations with the PA based on the "understandings reached in previous negotiations." In this, he showed himself to be utterly non-comprehending of the nature of democracy in general or of Israel's democracy specifically.

The new unity government of Israel owes its very existence to the fact that the vast majority of Israelis rejected the "understandings reached in previous negotiations." Moreover, by having preferred violence to negotiations, maximalism to compromise, and prevarication to probity, Arafat himself was the midwife in the birth of the new Israeli unity government, a government resolved to seek peace but determined not to surrender to terrorists, thugs and murderers. It would help his own cause, if Yasser Arafat understood this.

The Dutch-Paris Underground

I would like your readers' help in collecting stories about the rescues of Jewish families during World War II.

I learned that Jews in France were helped not only by Jewish organizations and themselves, but also by the Dutch-Paris underground, the Seventh Day Adventists seminary in Collonges-sous-Saleve and the Society of Friends (Quakers). With regard to the Dutch-Paris underground, some 400 people were involved between 1939 and 1943 in smuggling refugees into Switzerland, Spain and other safe destinations, until the Gestapo broke the ring and executed about 150 of the brave souls who were involved, forcing the rest to flee.

I would like also to document the activities of the Dutch-Paris underground, and ask that anyone who has information, contact me at my home, by telephone or by fax 416-658-3610.

Networks distort worldview

Only one head of state in the entire Middle East (comprising many nations) has been democratically elected and is accountable to his people. No nation on earth has the right to condemn any other nation, especially Israel, for doing all it can to protect the lives of its citizens. Sadly, too many of us are held captive and paralyzed by the iron grip of the world's media, fed a daily diet of distortions and half-truths.

The media has already judged him, Ariel Sharon, as a war criminal.

Our world view is coloured and often grossly disfigured by networks that manufacture the news. Who will speak of the true horrors in today's Middle East? Human shields, honour killings, holy war, mutilation of women and children, brutal dictatorships, human slavery, suicide martyrs, mob lynchings, hostage-takings, religious persecution. Our media, however, insist upon focusing obsessively on the ethical nuances of every Israeli decision while ignoring the murderous context of life in the region.

The final merger and takeover of CNN lends a chilling new meaning to the old cliché: Time will solve all problems. Let us dream of and work for a future when bridges between the peoples can lead to genuine peace agreements. Clearly, though, that time is not now.

Rabbi Irvin Brandwein
Town of Mount Royal, Que.

Israel will journey on

With Israel once again finding itself at a crossroads in its path of history, and Jews searching for seemingly impossible solutions, I am reminded of the work by Edward Flegg, Why I am a Jew, written with such insight and wisdom in 1927 for his unborn grandson. (It was published in 1943.)

The turning point in the author's search for identity was the Dreyfus affair of 1894, where a French soldier was wrongly condemned and convicted because he was a Jew.

As quoted by Flegg: "Alas, Israel is not a people of saints! The Jew knows his faults and his vices; he caricatures them to exaggeration in those 'Jewish stories' which he himself hawks around; they make him laugh, but they make him suffer, for nothing is more painful to him, nothing more difficult for him to pardon, than a Jewish stain on the family honour of Israel."

He concludes: "And I say to myself: From this remote father right up to my own father, all fathers have handed on to me a truth which flowed in their blood, which flows in mine; and shall I not hand it on, with my blood, to those of my blood?

"Will you take it from me, my child? Will you hand it on?...But, whether you abandon it or whether you follow it, Israel will journey on to the end of days."

The debate on the sovereignty of Israel, the rights of the Palestinians and the bartering for peace will continue, as will the temptation for assimilation which is so prevalent in North America, but the essential Yiddishkeit in a strong Jewish home and Jewish education will ultimately reign supreme in the survival of the Jewish people and the State of Israel.

Trip to Israel

We have just returned from a five-week trip to Israel which sped by much too quickly. We travel there several times a year because we love to, and because our children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren live there.

Since the present intifadah started in October, people have been reluctant to travel to the country. Western governments do not help matters by dissuading travellers from going.

But why wouldn't people go? Israel has the most beautiful hotels with the greatest ambience. It has wonderful restaurants serving kosher ethnic foods. The Tel Aviv opera is magnificent as is the ballet; new artists appear frequently and Israelis and visitors enjoy them with great delight. Scientific discoveries are made daily. We have snorkelled in many spots in the world, but the most amazing snorkelling is in Eilat. The coral and the fish are awesome; when I snorkel there I feel that God has created flower gardens under the sea.

Thank God while we were there many travellers came: the Birthright groups, solidarity groups from Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto, and many visitors from the United States, Canada and Europe. I believe they felt safer in Israel than they would have in many other parts of the world.

May God give the Israeli people endurance and long life.

Perspectives

In search of a new Zionism

The following is the first of two articles. Part 2 will be published next week.

By DEREK PENSLAR

Classical Zionism – the Zionism of Theodor Herzl, David Ben-Gurion, Vladimir (Ze'ev) Jabotinsky, as well as the State of Israel in its early decades – was largely secular. It was based on two principles: first, that the political security and cultural vitality of the Jewish people could be ensured only in a Jewish State; and second, that it was incumbent upon all Jews to either live in such a State or devote themselves to nurturing it from abroad.

Over the past two decades, Israelis have developed a distinct national culture that does not depend upon Zionist ideology. It is also often divorced from the Jewish religious heritage. As a result, secular Zionism has been replaced by a visceral ethnicity, which, however heartfelt, is poorly equipped to maintain a dynamic Hebrew culture or to provide relief for the enormous stresses and strains placed upon the Israeli population.

The Palmach Generation, led by David Ben-Gurion.

Secular Zionism is in need of renewal, but that renewal will come only through an infusion of enlightened Judaism as well as profound changes in Jewish historical self-understanding.

The Zionist movement of a hundred years ago was a revolution, a thoroughgoing change in political and cultural relations among Jews, and between Jews and the gentile world. When the revolution was fulfilled – that is, when the State of Israel was founded – secular Zionism was bound to ebb, although religious Zionism was guaranteed a longer lease on life.

All secular ideologies claim to solve the human condition in this world. If they succeed, as was the case with liberalism in the modern Western world, people lose interest in continued public activity and grow apathetic. If they fail, as was the case with communism in Eastern Europe, people grow embittered and either overthrow the system or stand at the sidelines when it runs out of steam.

Religious world views, on the other hand, postpone gratification to the world to come and read human history in a purely allegorical way, as a series of signs pointing to eternal truths in a higher sphere. Thus the revolution can be sustained for a far longer period of time.

During the period of Israel's struggle for independence, Zionism inspired collective sacrifice on behalf of the land. To coin a phrase, Kiddush HaShem, martyrdom in the name of God, was replaced by Kiddush hasham, sanctification of earthly existence in the land of Israel.

For example, in the great Labour Zionist poet Nathan Alterman's classic work The Silver Platter, two Zionist youths, a young man and woman, die in battle on behalf of a faceless throng, giving them "the silver platter upon which you will have the State of the Jews." The poem's youths display not only heroism but also elitism and even resentment, as they fight to carry out the ultimate sacrifice for the passive crowd, symbolizing Diaspora Jewry during the Holocaust.

Secular Zionism has been, since its inception, in a constant state of generational rebellion, its content changing over time depending on each generation's characteristics. There have been four rebellions in all. The founders of the State (Ben-Gurion, Katznelson, et al.) rejected their Diaspora Jewish fathers, only to be challenged in turn by their Palestinian-born children, referred to as "The Palmach Generation," named after the elite fighting force drawn from kibbutz youth during World War II. Whereas the founders sought to retain European Jewish culture within a new secular framework, their children cultivated a tough, indigenous (tsabar) identity, defined in opposition to the Jewish past.

The children of the Palmach Generation, in turn, rebelled against the rough-hewn sabra culture; this was the setting for the emergence in the late 1960s of the critical, anti-militaristic literature of the young Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua and, in the wake of the Yom Kippur War, of the Israeli peace movement.

This generation was still, for the most part, distinctly Zionist, displaying a fierce attachment to the Israeli State and a proprietary attitude towards Hebrew culture. But in the 1980s, these critical Zionists came under assault by a new wave of rebellion: a depoliticized, individualistic and universalistic post-Zionism. Although some aspects of post-Zionist Israeli society are quite encouraging, such as the powerful sense of homeland, of "Israeliness" (yisre'eliyut) which cements many Israelis to the country, rampant consumerism and Western popular culture are powerful solvents that have eroded many of Israel's distinct national qualities.

Secular Zionism's élan depended on constant opposition. It is a staple of modern nationality theory that the nation defines itself in terms of its putative other. Adversarial relationships, no matter how traumatic and exhausting they may be, bear a constructive dynamic. The collapse of generational rebellion within Zionism weakens the secular Zionist project, which cannot survive without an opponent against whom to battle.

The 'pioneering ethos' in the field. [Photos courtesy Keren Heyesod/UIA]

This conceptual tool helps us to understand the relationship between secular Zionism and rabbinic Judaism. The former distanced itself from, denigrated, and yet drew sustenance from the latter.

Generations of Zionist statesmen and writers widely employed Judaic language to express their secular Zionist sentiments. Searching for a meta-political significance for their actions, the Zionist Jacobins spoke the language of the ancien régime. Ben-Gurion frequently discussed Zionist ideology in biblical language, referring to Zionism's hazon (vision) or to Israel as the "Third Temple." Moshe Dayan did the same during the Yom Kippur War, writing that "the fate of the Third Temple is at stake."

The founders of the State of Israel struggled against rabbinism precisely because they were desperately dependent upon it. Early Israeli culture, even at its most secular instance, was imbued with religious language and sentiments. No sooner was statehood declared in 1948 than a battle erupted over the young State's official symbol, the menorah (representing the temple cult), versus Herzl's envisioned seven stars, representing the seven hour working day in his utopian Jewish state. As is well known, the menorah won out.

To be sure, there is a strong religious rhetorical impulse in much of 20th-century Western society, particularly with reference to war. Israel is hardly the only country to evoke religious motifs in its commemoration of its war dead or in its myth of the fallen soldier as sacrificing for the nation. But such language has been far stronger in Israel due to the proximity of Israeli culture to the Jewish religious tradition (at most a few generations distant) and the Hebrew language's own youthful state, in which it was, until quite recently, dependent on religious language. To this day, the linguistic channels of the Hebrew liturgy affect the way powerful feeling is expressed.

In addition, most of Israel's memory sites are part of its religious heritage: the Galilee, and all the more so the central part of the country, have ancient Judaic roots.

Underneath secular Zionism's anticlerical bombast was a "guilty conscience," a sense that the rabbinic Jewish past was more authentic than Zionism and so must be preserved. Thus Ben-Gurion's legitimization of Orthodoxy in the notorious status quo agreements of 1947 and his 1952 meeting with the Hazon Ish (Rabbi Yeshiyahu Kerlitz), in which Ben-Gurion tried to convince the rabbi of Zionism's legitimacy.

Similarly, Ben-Gurion was unwilling to proclaim a constitution in which the extent of secular state authority would be clearly laid out.

Despite secular Zionism's break with Judaic tradition, its acts of rebellion actually cemented it into that tradition. The Hebrew Bible may have been read as a national epic rather than a source of revelation, yet its constant stress on return and redemption could not help but invite transcendent as well as worldly readings.

Conversely, the secular pioneering ethos of Labour Zionism fed directly into transcendent, quasi-religious world views. Even for much of the Zionist left, the State of Israel became the servant of the land of Israel. Such was the view of Alterman, who zealously championed Israeli settlement in the entire land of Israel following the Six Day War.

Orthodoxy, in turn, was mobilized by Labour, which imbued it with the activist world view of pioneering and militarized religious faith. Thus we account for the post-1967 settler mentality, in which military actions endow a religious myth with enhanced, even central, meaning. Signs of this way of thinking emerged even earlier, at the time of the Israeli invasion of the Sinai in 1956, when Chief Army Rabbi Shmuel Goren said, 'The machine gun and the spirit of Judaism depend on one another."

Whose Jerusalem?

In the ongoing debate over a united Jerusalem some extreme arguments have been advanced. One of them is the claim that Jews never had any relationship with Jerusalem at all, and that all the records to that effect are falsifications.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Yet what about the Bible, and especially the Psalms, that proclaim our eternal adherence to the dream of a Jerusalem that will reflect the glory of God and the hopes of His people? Our prayers have, for untold ages, reflected the poet's promise: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand wither if I remember thee not."

I am glad to note that among those who have come to our assistance are Christians who live in Israel. Recently, however, their numbers have diminished rapidly, especially under unrelenting Arab pressure to disregard the biblical promise.

Not surprisingly, there is no Christian unanimity on the issue of Jerusalem's governance and especially on whose sovereignty should prevail. Still, when some weeks ago, Christians around the world were polled, many signed a significant resolution. The quarterly journal Christians and Israel, published in Jerusalem, has reported on the findings:

The petition was signed by more than 100,000 individuals, as well as by leaders representing more than 14 million Christians from 117 countries, and was presented to Jerusalem's mayor Ehud Olmert during the annual Sukkot celebration at the International Convention Centre in Jerusalem. The festivities had been organized by the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem and the presentation was made by the embassy director and co-founder of the organization, Johann Lückoff.

"We, the undersigned," the statement reads, "support Israel's exclusive claim to sovereignty over a united Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. We commend Israel for its exemplary record in guaranteeing access to the biblical sites in Jerusalem and throughout Israel, and support the continuation of Israel in this role.

"Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has demanded that, as part of any permanent settlement with Israel, he be given control over eastern Jerusalem, including the Muslim, Armenian and Christian quarters of the ancient Old City and the Temple Mount. That would place in Palestinian hands the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, traditional site of Jesus' burial and resurrection.

"Arafat has proclaimed himself the guardian of Christian holy places – a claim rejected by the Vatican."

As is obvious from the above, we Jews are not the only ones who are worried about the ongoing debate over the unity of Jerusalem. Hopefully, some new and vigorous Christian input – which in the past was rarely favourable to Israel – will help restore some sanity to the debate.

Bullets fly in hillside neighbourhood

With winter fast receding and spring imminent, dusk in Jerusalem no longer falls in the afternoon. Soon the clocks will jump forward, further prolonging daylight well into the evening. This year, like never before, residents of the city's southern Gilo neighbourhood are especially sensitive to the light outside.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Since last October, when Arab gunmen from the neighbouring village of Beit Jala began their violent campaign against Gilo as part of the current Palestinian uprising, beleaguered residents have greeted the darkness with trepidation. Most attacks they've suffered have occurred after nightfall.

By now, after nearly half a year of such attrition, the scenario is depressingly familiar to Gilo residents – and to IDF soldiers stationed there since the shootings began. Every few days – sometimes more often, sometimes less – the war-like ritual unfolds without warning.

As the sun sets and a tranquil darkness envelops the hilltop neighbourhood, the highest in Jerusalem, a sudden barrage of bullets pierces the evening sky. From across the small valley separating Gilo from Beit Jala, Palestinian terrorists open fire at apartment buildings barely 200 metres away.

There's no mistaking the staccato crackling of the Kalashnikov guns. Residents dive for cover inside their homes, huddling low to escape bullets buzzing in through windows not blocked by sandbags or steel shutters.

IDF soldiers swing into action, ordering anyone outside to come indoors and sometimes calling for a blackout on certain streets for safety. Young conscripts crouched behind sandbags blast away with automatic weapons and anti-tank missiles at the Palestinian snipers. The IDF retaliation is welcomed by Gilo residents but does little to calm their shattered nerves.

These frequent "firefights" have taken their toll on Gilo's 40,000 inhabitants, especially those living closest to Beit Jala. In addition to several casualties, they suffer from constant fear and anxiety. The municipality has sent psychologists to treat traumatized schoolchildren, and social workers to help the elderly.

Physically, parts of Gilo look as if they're under siege. Authorities erected barricades in the southern part of the neighbourhood that faces Beit Jala. The IDF, for example, built a seven-foot-high cement wall as a barrier to protect people from incoming fire. To lessen the eyesore, which locals likened to the Berlin Wall, artists painted colourful, pastoral scenes on it.

Last month, municipal workers took measurements to fit bulletproof windows in 900 homes. Schools and kindergartens have been already outfitted with such protection. Residents were told the bulletproof glass would provide protection against light weapons but would not hold up to tank or machine-gun fire.

This, of course, is no way to live, but most residents have few alternatives. They can't afford to move given that the prices of their homes have plummeted and people aren't exactly lining up to buy into a residential community that now doubles as a front-line battleground.

When the firing becomes especially fierce, the IDF deploys heavier weapons, including helicopter gunships, as well as two tanks now stationed next to Gilo. On such nights, my family can hear the sounds of battle from our home. As the crow – or bullet – flies, we live about a mile from Gilo and seemingly under the flight path of IDF helicopters. The roar of these monster choppers is what rattles my wife and children the most. But at least we're not in the line of fire.

Until last fall, Gilo was barely known outside Israel, let alone outside Jerusalem. Like many Jewish neighbourhoods in the city, it was built just over the old 1967 border with Jordan. It was always a quiet, working class community rarely in the news. But as a result of the unexpected attacks from Palestinians, Gilo has frequently been invaded by local and foreign journalists and has become a place of pilgrimage for Jewish groups from abroad wanting to show their solidarity with the embattled community.

Established in 1973, Gilo has never known a winter like the one it just experienced. Sadly, even if the past two weeks have been relatively quiet, there is little to indicate that the spring will offer residents reason to take down the sandbags and open their windows that face Beit Jala.

In Barak's failures, a renewed unity

Ehud Barak made many mistakes during his brief tenure as prime minister, but he also deserves credit for a few important achievements. As a result of his policies, we now know exactly where we stand with respect to what was once known as the "Oslo peace process."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For many years, Barak had objected to the framework in which Israel steadily gave up assets in exchange for a distant and uncertain "permanent status agreement." As the IDF's Chief of Staff and a protégé of the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Barak was not afraid to voice his objections when the agreement was signed.

When he became prime minister in 1999, Barak's views did not change. Six years had elapsed since the Oslo agreement was signed, but Arafat's intentions and the Palestinian rhetoric of hatred and violence had not changed. Extending Benyamin Netanyahu's policies, Barak ended the transfer of land to the Palestinian Authority, and moved directly to what was to be the final round of negotiations. At the Sharm el Sheik summit in September 1999, the leaders agreed on a one-year deadline for reaching an agreement.

Although ostensibly welcoming this approach, Arafat and the Palestinians were never interested in moving this direction. Since 1994, they had benefited from the one-way street, in which they received control of land and most of the trappings of sovereignty, without providing anything in return.

Once they realized that Barak was serious, the Palestinian leadership began to howl, resorting to the victimization theme that has served them so well. They demanded the transfer of 95 percent of the territory immediately, but without success. After almost handing over neighbourhoods in East Jerusalem, Barak returned to his original policies.

The Palestinians went through the motions of permanent status negotiations, which focused primarily on borders and settlements. During this period, there was no discussion of the refugee issue or of Jerusalem, and the American and Israeli officials involved in this process assumed (without any evidence) that these "symbolic issues" would be resolved quickly once the practical aspects were settled.

After over a year without concrete change, Barak's political mandate began to erode, and the Clinton administration's "window of opportunity" was closing. In desperation, the United States convened the Camp David talks in July. Barak put all of his (and Israel's) cards on the table, going farther than any Israeli leader had considered before, practically begging for a deal. He accepted Palestinian statehood and agreed to dismantle almost all settlements (and to exchange land for the blocs to remain along the 1948 cease-fire line). He also agreed to share or divide control in Jerusalem and to resolve the refugee issue.

In response, Arafat folded, demonstrating that he is not willing to reach any compromises with Israel. The Palestinians continue to cling to all of their myths and extremist demands, particularly on Jerusalem, on what they refer to as the "right of return" and the "historic justice for the Palestinians." It is clear that an unambiguous end to the Arab-Israeli conflict is not going to happen as long as Arafat runs the PA.

While this was a painful process that triggered the Palestinian attacks that began a few months later, Israelis now know that regardless of their concessions, the Palestinian leadership is not ready to end the existential conflict with Israel. The efforts to blame the settlements ("the occupation") and the settlers for the continued violence and conflict have proven to be baseless. The core of the Arab-Israeli conflict has always been, and continues to be, Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state, in its ancient homeland.

Barak's failure to reach an agreement with the Palestinians, at almost any price, has brought Israelis back to the core issues and have allowed us to unite with the knowledge that no matter what Arafat is offered, the answer will continue to be "no." While far from his intentions, we can at least thank Barak for clarifying our situation and restoring our sense of purpose as we continue the fight for survival.

The Kirshner File

Canada's quintessential man of letters

University dropout Alberto Manguel is living proof that a self-taught person should never be underestimated.

A renowned writer and editor, Manguel is a Jewish man of letters whose catholic sensibilities are the antithesis of the 20th-century specialist. Born in Buenos Aires, partially raised in Tel Aviv and a citizen of Canada since 1985, he ascribes his eclectic tastes to his decision to forgo a formal higher education.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"I would have been a different person had I finished university," explained Manguel, whose books of non-fiction include The Dictionary of Imaginary Places, A History of Reading and, most recently, Reading Pictures (Alfred A. Knopf Canada), a treatise on paintings, buildings, sculptures, picture postcards and museums.

Looking back, he added, "I would have been trained to think systematically and to avoid digressions and asides, which is what all my writing is about."

At the University of Buenos Aires, Manguel, a bookish child whose father was Argentina's first ambassador to Israel, evinced an interest in philosophy. Otherwise, he was rather bored by his courses. "It seemed like a waste of time," said Manguel, who dreamed of being a teacher or a librarian.

A person who takes pride in availing himself of all intellectual pleasures, Manguel is an essayist (Into the Looking Glass Wood: Essays on Words and the World), an anthologist (Black Water, Meanwhile, In Another Part of the Forest, and The Gates of Paradise) and a novelist (News From a Foreign Country Came).

Critics have said admiringly that he brings to his craft a child-like wonder relatively rare in adults. He agrees with this assessment. "I'm astonished that in this monstrous world, so full of hatred and greed, we are still capable of creating so much beauty. So, yes, this keeps me in a state of constant wonder."

Manguel's joy in the written word, immediately apparent to an interviewer, is a function of his "peculiar childhood."

Now 52, he was reared by a German-speaking Czech Holocaust survivor. Manguel's parents, Pablo and Rosa, essentially left it to Ellen Slonitz, his nanny, to educate him until his seventh birthday. "I didn't attend school in Israel," recalled Manguel, who acquired English and German before Spanish, French, Italian and Portuguese. "My nanny was my teacher. She allowed me to read what I wanted, and that's how I developed a love for books."

Pablo Manguel, who died some 15 years ago, was a 34-year-old newspaper union lawyer when President Juan Peron tapped him to be Argentina's envoy to the newly established State of Israel. An assimilated Jew whose father had immigrated to Argentina from the Austro-Hungarian Empire at the turn of the last century, he claimed with some pride to have been the first foreign ambassador in Israel to present his credentials.

Manguel believes his father was appointed to that position to mollify Jewish opinion in and out of Argentina. "Peron had made lots of money after the war selling passports to Nazis. He tried to appease Jews by naming a Jew as ambassador to Israel. Peron wanted to make a gesture to Jews."

Arriving in Tel Aviv shortly after David Ben-Gurion's proclamation of statehood, an act which prompted seven Arab armies to invade Israel, Pablo Manguel took his job most seriously. "He negotiated shipments of wheat and meat to Israel."

The Manguels lived in the embassy on Trumpeldor Street, and enjoyed the privileges of diplomats. "It was a wonderful place," said Manguel, referring to Israel. Thanks to an obliging chauffeur, he and his nanny discovered the country on idyllic drives from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea.

Manguel's parents, being thoroughly assimilated and celebrating Christmas and Easter, did not raise him Jewishly. "There was no intent on their part to bring me up as a Jew," he said. "I didn't know I was Jewish for a long time."

Upon their return to Argentina in 1955, Manguel's father was arrested by the new military government. Accused of being a Peron collaborator, he languished in prison for a year. When he was released, he tried, without success, to carve out a niche in politics. He died embittered, feeling abandoned by his friends.

Forty-five years after leaving Israel, Manguel was there again as a guest of the Jerusalem Book Fair. His impressions were mixed. "I met a great number of brilliant people, but I found people terribly rude. Push and shove and scream."

The eldest of three brothers and one sister, he spent his formative years in Buenos Aires. One of his fondest memories is of working in a book shop and of meeting the great Argentine novelist Jorge Luis Borges there. One particular afternoon, Borges, who was blind, asked Manguel if he could read to him at his home. He jumped at the invitation.

"It was an enormously liberating experience," said Manguel, fondly recalling their conversation about the importance of books and of reading. Years later, Manguel penned an essay about that magical encounter.

Manguel, who considers himself an agnostic, discovered he was Jewish in an anti-Semitic incident during which his teen-aged tormentors tossed off disparaging remarks about Jews and money.

Alberto Manguel

After leaving university at age 18, the precocious Manguel found work as an editor in a publishing house. He did not lack self-confidence. "I had been reading so long that I was familiar with literature."

He left Argentina in 1968, bound for Europe. "I wanted to see the world, and Europe fascinated me. It seemed like the centre of culture, though Argentina was also vibrant. I lived in cafes in London, Paris and Barcelona."

During this period, Manguel was a reader, editor and translator, not only in Europe but in Tahiti as well.

Manguel decided to settle in Canada in 1982 at the urging of his agent, Lucinda Vardey; his editor, Louise Dennys, who had been instrumental in publishing his first book, The Dictionary of Imaginary Places; and his acquaintance, the novelist Margaret Atwood. "It was the best decision of my life," he said, speaking glowingly of Canadian democracy.

Since then, he has returned to Argentina on short visits to see his mother – whose grandfather was a farmer in one of Baron de Hirsch's colonies, and three siblings.

"It's very painful to go back. Argentina is a country of ghosts. So many of my friends were tortured and killed by the military regime [which held sway from 1976 to 1983]. Argentina seems haunted, and hasn't come to terms with the massacres."

Infinitely sad when he discusses his homeland, Manguel observed: "Buenos Aires was like Mittel Europa, a world centre in Latin America. There was an intellectual richness that Peron crushed."

Argentina, though blessed with natural resources and a high literacy rate, has not lived up to its potential, he noted sombrely.

Manguel, who is currently resting before embarking on his next novel, has no idea how many books he has read in a lifetime of voracious reading. But he certainly knows what he likes. The novels that have most affected him are Alice in Wonderland, Don Quixote, Heart of Darkness and The Man Who Was Thursday.

Although he is no admirer of contemporary American literature, he has a high regard for Saul Bellow, Ernest Hemingway and William Faulkner, whose works are in his library of 50,000 volumes. "I have opened all of them, though I have not read each book from cover to cover," he said.

A cosmopolitan who recently purchased a cottage south of Paris, Manguel cannot understand why major North American publishers are generally loath to publish foreign novelists in English-language editions. "Nothing gets translated into English today," he complained. "They have no interest whatsoever in the literature of the world."

In his view, one of the most neglected writers of our time is Yehuda Elberg, a Warsaw Ghetto survivor who lives in Montreal and whose mother tongue is Yiddish.

"He is one of the most important Yiddish writers today," said Manguel, comparing him to the Russian master, Fyodor Dostoyevsky. His voice rising in indignation, he noted, "Canadian publishers have not published him!"

Syracuse University Press, however, has issued two of Elberg's finest novels, Ship of the Hunted and The Empire of Kemel the Cripple. Manguel, having read Elberg with mounting delight, wrote an introduction to his collection of short stories.

Elberg, he observed, is the archetypal writer who preserves Jewish memory through the everlastingly beautiful medium of words.

Zundel's departure seen as victory against racism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The departure from Canada of Holocaust denier and Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel marks a significant victory in the battle against racism, say observers of the Canadian extremist movement.

Zundel's move to a friendlier climate south of the border recognizes that Canada is inhospitable ground for Holocaust deniers and their ilk, said Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, and Marvin Kurz, legal counsel for B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

"Zundel turned tail and ran from Canada," Kurz said. "If anything, you can say he voted with his feet."

"The many years of efforts, of hounding Zundel, have finally paid off," Landy said.

Zundel's reported departure to join his third wife, Ingrid Rimland, in the United States, came less than a week before final arguments were to be heard in a landmark case involving the proposed application of human rights legislation to the Internet.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission, acting on a complaint from Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron and the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations, is seeking a cease and desist order to prevent Zundel from offering anti-Semitic and Holocaust-denial material on the Zundelsite. The Commission contends the material brings hatred and contempt on Jews. A two-member panel, which was informed by letter that Zundel had left Canada, is currently considering the case. Their decision is expected in a few months.

Warren Kinsella, author of Web of Hate: Inside Canada's Far-Right Network, called Zundel's reported departure "great news. It indicates where he thought the human rights decision was going."

"He's one of the forces on the Internet. He's read by hundreds of thousands of people" and he probably felt that to maintain his Web presence, he'd have to move to the United States. "It sure looks like the behaviour of someone who didn't see a total victory," he said.

Kurz agreed Zundel likely expected to lose the case and did not wish to amend the material offered on the site. "Zundel spent four years [before the tribunal] defending it, even while claiming it was not his," Kurz said.

"What it demonstrates to me is that Canadian society is not very comfortable with the things Zundel says," he stated.

The high profile Holocaust denier has suffered several other reversals in recent years, including the rejection of his bid for Canadian citizenship and the determination by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service that he is a security risk to Canada. He was convicted twice in the 1980s for distributing lies dènying the Holocaust, but the Supreme Court of Canada threw out those verdicts, ruling the "false news" section of the Criminal Code was unconstitutional.

"I think a big blow was felt with the Lipstadt case," Landy said, referring to the British court decision which rejected the libel action launched by history writer David Irving against author Deborah Lipstadt.

"The case does have a significant impact on Holocaust deniers," Landy said. "I think the findings in that case were a blow to those who tried to convey lies about the Holocaust."

Canadian extremists have "lost their champion," Landy said. "We can look forward to a period for a while where hate propaganda and Holocaust-denial material will not be as readily available."

In addition to the material distributed by Zundel, he has been an important resource to the extremist movement in Canada. He provided activists with a place to stay, money, Internet access for their views, printing materials and other benefits, Kinsella said.

His departure should lift Canada's reputation, said Len Rudner, Congress' Ontario director of community relations. The climate for Zundel has been "extremely uncomfortable and he's decided it's not worth the aggravation.

"I think the fact he [left Canada] won't be lost on the people in the movement who see him as their hero," he said.

Court rules against former SS auxiliary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former member of an SS auxiliary unit posted to a forced labour camp lied to obtain Canadian citizenship, a Federal Court judge ruled last week.

Wasyl Odynsky, 77, was trained as an auxiliary "wachmann" at the SS camp at Trawniki and later served as a guard at the Poniatowa forced labour camp and with the SS Streibel Battalion. Prior to immigrating to Canada in 1949, Odynsky would have been interviewed by Canadian security officials in Europe about his wartime activities and would have been excluded had he told the truth about that service, Judge Andrew MacKay stated in a 112-page judgement.

The judge's finding opens the door for federal authorities to strip Odynsky of his citizenship and deport him. However the judge suggested other factors may come into play at a later point in the proceedings. He noted that Odynsky did not voluntarily join the SS unit nor was he involved in any wrongdoing since arriving in Canada.

"While these factors may be relevant to any discretion the Minister or the Governor in Council (the Cabinet) may exercise, they are not relevant in this proceeding," he said.

The decision elicited markedly different reactions from Jewish and Ukrainian spokesmen.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen applauded the judgement and urged federal authorities to quickly remove Odynsky from Canada.

"Odynsky's past has caught up with him at last," Ronen said.

"The concentration camp guards at Trawniki were responsible for the murder of hundreds of Jewish prisoners who were the last survivors charged with burning corpses. People involved in such crimes should not have the privilege of living out their days in comfort and ease in a country like Canada."

John Gregorovich, chair of the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association (UCCLA), adopted a markedly different perspective.

"The learned judge has made it clear Odynsky was not a war criminal,was not a Nazi, and did not participate in any war crimes or atrocities," he said.

"Under duress, he had to serve in a guard unit during the war years. He is, in that respect, no different from any Jewish kapo who, likewise, had no choice but to work for his captors."

Gregorovich's comparison with Jewish kapos was not directly made by MacKay, though the judge noted that prisoners at Poniatowa "were under direct supervision of Jewish 'capos,' who were responsible for maintaining order and discipline among them, and within the factories German civilian staff directed their work."

MacKay also found that while Odynsky was present in November 1943 when the SS murdered an estimated 15,000 prisoners at Poniatowa in one day as part of operation "Harvest Festival," he and other "Trawniki men" were confined to barracks during the atrocity.

Prior to that, his duties consisted of guarding a housing facility a kilometre from Poniatowa, "ostensibly for protection against attack by partisans and to check labourer-prisoners leaving each morning and returning at night.

"There was no evidence at trial that Odynsky participated personally in any incident involving mistreatment of prisoners or of any other person during his service with the SS guard units or with Battalion Striebel," the judge stated.

In a press release at a Ukrainian news Web site (www.brama.com), Gregorovich called on "members of our community and other Canadians to write to the Minster of Citizenship and Immigration...and to your own MP, recommending that no further action be taken against Odynsky.

"That an innocent man should have been subjected to the emotional and financial traumas that he and his family have endured for some three years is proof enough of just how unfair the current policy is..."

About the only point Congress and the UCCLA agreed upon was that the case had dragged on too long.

"Given the time-sensitive nature of these cases, it is disappointing that 3½ years have elapsed between the serving of notice to Odynsky and the decision to proceed with denaturalization," stated Jack Silverstone, Congress executive-director and general counsel.

"Judicial and political delays have already taken their toll on previous cases as suspects and witnesses have died in mid-course. Due process in these cases must be commensurate with the urgency of natural justice."

Congress recently criticized federal authorities for the delay in the Helmut Oberlander case. A Federal Court judge found one year ago that Oberlander lied to obtain Canadian citizenship, but the former killing unit interpreter has not been stripped of his citizenship. Oberlander also claimed to have no involvement in atrocities.

Model UN is a real success

By LIOR BRAUNSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When the CHAT delegation to Yeshiva University's model UN disembarked from a rickety, old American Airlines airplane, they were ready to concentrate on the world issues at hand, after months of intense preparation and research.

A Student's View

Yeshiva University's model UN has been a tradition for little over a decade, this being the 11th annual conference. Held at Kutsher's Country Club in New York, this sitting, from Feb. 11 to 13, dealt with issues ranging from genetically modified foods to nuclear disarmament. It was the task of students from over 30 cities across North America to bring peace and harmony to a civilization in turmoil.

In three three-hour sessions every day, delegates representing every UN country argued on their respective topics. Each of the arguments raised by delegates was aimed at compiling a resolution that would then have to pass a two-thirds or majority vote.

By the end of the conference, CHAT's Jared Gordon had secured a Best Delegate Award and Michal Gordon (unrelated) received an honourable mention for her insights on the World Food Program.

The event was also great opportunity to meet people from other parts of the continent. Sharing the same Canadian pride, the CHAT delegation quickly became friends with a group of Montreal students affiliated with Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, becoming allies during heated arguments and just hanging out during the hour of free time before curfew.

In general, the conference was a truly memorable experience and a huge success. Resolutions were passed that even Kofi Annan himself would be proud to endorse. Not only did we all learn about the intense workings of the real UN, but the social aspect of the weekend gave the participants a sense of belonging and Jewish pride.

Lior Braunstein is a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

NATIVE ARTS: Students from Associated Hebrew Schools Middle school recently participated in an art project that focused on the native peoples of Canada. The event came as part of the social studies curriculum and featured five art-making stations. Students constructed native dream catchers, long houses, totem poles and masks. Seen here are grade 6 students (from left) Gilad Maya, David Drutz and David Kovac.

Jewish Life

Overcoming death—rituals for renewal

By RABBI RON AIGEN

Rabbinic Reflections

Whenever we come into contact with death, we run the risk of becoming somewhat deadened ourselves. We lose the zest for life and the spark of creativity; we get stuck in the past. This danger underlies the basic thinking in all the biblical warnings against idolatry. Idolatry is a fixation on a thing or an idea that connotes a deadening of the spirit. The Jewish antidote to idolatry is the pursuit of holiness, kedushah, by every means the Torah can convey. The Jewish concept of holiness is synonymous with "choosing life." And yet, paradoxically, we find that the pursuit of holiness itself can also be fraught with danger.

The weekly Torah portion of Ki Tisa comprises a variety of episodes that convey that single message: in approaching the sacred realm, we put ourselves at risk. We see this in several instances: in the warning to offer "a ransom for our souls" when taking the census (Exodus 30:12); in the need to purify the priest's hands and feet in the laver prior to entering the Tent of Meeting, "lest they die" (Exodus 30:18-21); in the command, "Whoever profanes the Shabbat shall be put to death, that person shall be cut off from his people" (Exodus 31:13-15); in the Golden Calf episode in which thousands died as the result of their idolatrous betrayal of God (Exodus 32); and in the second revelation at Sinai in which God told Moses, "No man can see My face and live; you will see My back, but My face must not be seen" (Exodus 33).

All of these episodes warn us that if we disregard the necessary boundaries of the sacred, or attempt to misuse or possess it, we run the risk of destroying it or being destroyed by it. In the classic story of idolatry, the Golden Calf, Moses had to smash the tablets of the Law in order to prevent the Torah itself from becoming an object of idolatrous worship.

Even the most positive means for creating holiness can be turned into idolatry. Holiness is not something we can ever fully possess or hold on to. We cannot touch or see the holy "en face." We can only "see" where holiness has been at work.

At the same time, we have rituals that help us overcome idolatry's deadening effect. The ritual of the Red Heifer (Numbers 19) that we read about on this special Shabbat Parah is one example. Just prior to Hag Ha-Aviv, the Festival of Spring, rebirth and renewal, we need to examine our inner lives and cleanse ourselves of all that threatens to kill our spirit. The ritual of the Red Heifer reminds us to let go of the symbolic death of winter and all the other deadening experiences which prevent us from moving more fully into the life-affirming, upcoming holiday of spring and liberation – Pesach.

We see such concern for overcoming the death of the spirit on the collective level as well. In the Haftorah for Shabbat Parah, the prophet Ezekiel addressed the Jews of the sixth century BCE Babylonian exile, whose entire civilization was threatened with extinction. He challenged the Jews of his generation with the task of renewal: "I will sprinkle the life-affirming waters… and I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit in you." Ezekiel used the ancient rituals of renewal and overcoming death as a challenge to reconstruct Jewish life at a time when all lay in ruins.

Ezekiel's challenge was echoed in our own time by Mordecai Kaplan, the founder of Reconstructionism. Can we instill a new heart and a new spirit in the body of the Jewish people in the age of modernity and in the face of assimilation?

We need to let go of those things and ways of thinking that are no longer appropriate to the current reality in which we live. More importantly, we ought to realize that those very objects which are most sacred to us, including most sacred rituals and the Torah itself, can also become objects of idolatry. This was the lesson of the Golden Calf. The true nature of sanctity is that it must be a living reality, not a museum piece. Above all, our Jewish religion ought to help us to fight against the idolatries that deaden our spirit and to promote life in such a way that we feel revitalized by it.

Rabbi Aigen is the spiritual leader of Congregation Dorshei Emet in Montreal.

In defence of delayed gratification

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

One of the great foes of education is the penchant – found in students and in the culture at large – for instant gratification. Quick fixes, unearned comforts, immediate "wisdom" – all of these delay and subvert the long, slow process of sorting information, thinking, reflecting and ultimately discerning what is valuable and what is dispensable – the trademark of the examined life.

This aversion to delaying gratification is perhaps best exemplified in the nature of current sexual mores, informed as they are by a sense of casualness about relations at a young age. The dangers of an earlier time – be they pregnancy or simply social disapproval – have all collapsed in the wake of easily available contraception and a scorn for modesty or puritanical caution. Sublimating such desire is seen as unnecessary or even unhealthy. And yet it is no accident that the root of sublimation is actually "sublime," a notion introduced by Jean-Jacques Rousseau as a way of expressing that the conquering of body gratification can lead to the pursuit of ideas, an elevation of basic passions into noble truths.

Along these lines is the very unfortunate current tendency to believe that spiritual and intellectual dilemmas should be solved in the manner of technological difficulties: rapidly and efficiently. But true education is not like taking a pill or turning on a machine, where a resolution of the problem may occur within minutes. Teachers of religion are sometimes intimidated by this lust for results in a short amount of time, and are thus seduced into an attempt to "prove" that God exists, or to discuss secret codes in the Bible that attempt to show how reality is encrypted every 24 letters in Scripture. But this is a model awkwardly borrowed from science – the idea that God, which by definition allows for mystery and ineffability, can and should be demonstrated through "evidence."

Indeed, what religious education could and must provide is an alternative model to the current drag race down the information highway. What, for instance, would happen, if we invited students to sit silently with their thoughts for, say, two minutes each day (perhaps 30-60 seconds for younger children)? What if we taught meditation in the older grades, again for a few minutes?

By teaching silence, I do not mean teaching some formal religious process such as prayer, which, as a cursory glance in many a sanctuary will reveal, is often the tragic antithesis of this kind of disciplined liberating stillness. Rather, I refer to the ability to create some "alonetime" for oneself, what Herman Melville in Moby Dick called "a Tahiti of the soul."

No doubt such suggestions will seem ludicrous to some, conditioned as we are to seeing teaching as the task of enabling the student to swallow as many facts as can be digested. Scott Peck has written that one of the key life skills that no one is ever formally taught is the ability to listen. This encompasses not only listening to others but listening to oneself. Silence is the prerequisite for listening, for allowing other people to reveal themselves properly. Impatience, and the need to "complete the curriculum," are the enemies of such silence, and, as such, are the enemies of the student's soul.

Jewish Life

To Bee a prodigy

Bee Season*, by Myla Goldberg, Doubleday 32.95

Bee Season's Naumann Family – outwardly sane and respectable – is actually a study in alienation and dysfunction.

Saul, the father and nominal head of the household, has become the cantor of a small liberal synagogue on the outskirts of Philadelphia. What is most important to him is studying Jewish mysticism. In his large, cluttered, book-lined study, he pores over obscure rabbinic texts in search of some elusive truth. He is self-absorbed, narcissistic and pays scant attention to his two children.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Saul does, however, have extravagant expectations for his 16-year-old son Aaron, who although sensitive and socially awkward, is bright and thoughtful.

Eliza, Saul's daughter, is an ugly duckling. She is shy, deficient in her studies and a dim presence in her fifth grade classroom. Neither brother or sister can claim a friend, and in their loneliness, they crave some form of recognition and approval from their distant and unapproachable father.

Miriam, wife and mother, is a successful lawyer, but high strung and obsessed with household cleanliness. She gradually drifts into a state of emotional disequilibrium, trying to find meaning in her unrewarding life by entering the empty homes of neighbours and stealing small objects of little value.

Everything changes when Eliza suddenly turns out to be a spelling prodigy. Where the skill comes from is a mystery, but somehow the vowels and consonants form correctly in her mind.

She advances from one victory to another – first at her school spelling bee, then at the town contest and finally at a regional competition – which makes her eligible for the nationals in Washington.

Eliza's father is now deeply impressed. Is his daughter spiritually endowed like those persons described in the writings of the medieval kabbalist Abraham Abulafia? Is it possible that she can communicate with God in some form of meditative transcendence?

Aaron, the erstwhile favourite, is now cast aside, as Eliza becomes the fanatical object of her father's attention. The discarded son, who at one time served as his father's assistant in the synagogue, is now in search of some kind of religious security and enlightenment. He finds a haven in a Hare Krishna temple.

Miriam, increasingly detached from her family, becomes hallucinogenic and falls ever deeper into psychosis. Eventually the police discover her years of petty theft and she ends up in a mental institution.

Eliza, now a student of mysticism under her father's tutelage, has to make a crucial decision: Should she heed her father's demand and become a disciple of Abulafia, or should she find meaning in a life of her own choosing?

In the end, Eliza's decision flows from Abulafia's warning that the quest for esoteric knowledge can be dangerous because it leads to excessive pride and often to the devastation of the soul.

Bee Season, the author's first novel, is refreshingly remote from mainstream American fiction and is a surprising, absorbing tour de force.

How to find kosher wine

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Little did Rabbi Dov Behr Manischewitz know over a century ago, that his name would become associated with one of the largest kosher wine companies in the world. Despite their popularity, labels like Loganberry and the venerable Concord Grape have not convinced wine drinkers that kosher wines can compare with the finest that France, Italy or California have to offer.

Many kosher winemakers say their products can rival the best. They are trying to get that message across with some sophisticated sites on the Internet. So what better time to sample their sites than as we prepare for Passover!

Where did the idea that "kosher wine" equals "sweet wine" come from? According to the Kosher Wine Institute [www.kedemwines.com/institut. htm], "the poor quality of Kosher wine is due largely to historical circumstance. The Concord grape, the only available variety for Jewish immigrants arriving in the New York area, is an acidic grape which must be balanced with sugar to be enjoyed. Hence, sweet wine. Time passes, and compromise becomes tradition."

If extra sugar and Concord grapes don't make a wine kosher, then what does? The rules surrounding the production of kosher wine are much more stringent than those regarding other kinds of kosher food. Equipment used to make the wine is used exclusively for the production of kosher products. Only Sabbath observant Jews can handle the grapes and wine. In fact, no non-Jew can come in direct contact with the wine or associated machinery unless the juice has been briefly heated ("mevushal") to between 85 and 90 degrees Celsius. Many critics of kosher wine claim that this heat-flash pasteurization damages the wine, while winemakers say modern techniques minimize the effects of the heating. For more details about kashrut and winemaking, see [www.kedemwines.com/kosher.htm] and [www.kosherwine.com/kashrut.htm]. In Israel, a tithe, ma'aser, one percent of the wine produced every year, is poured away, symbolizing the tithe given to the priests at the time of the Holy Temples [www.carmelwines.co.il/kashrut.html].

I was impressed with the Web sites of the family-run wineries. The Herzog Family's giant Royal Wine Corporation [www.kedemwines.com/] traces its roots to 19th-century Czechoslovakia. The company is now based in New York and is known for its Kedem and Baron Herzog lines. When Schapiro's Wines was founded in 1899, the company's motto was "wine so thick you can cut it with a knife" [www.schapirowine.com]. America's oldest kosher winery still produces its Extra Heavy Concord, but also produces a Naturally Sweet Concord with half the sweetness.

And Manischewitz? Actually Manischewitz wine is not produced by Rabbi Dov Behr's B. Manischewitz Company [www.manischewitz.com/]. The famous name is licensed to Widmer's Wine Cellars of Naples, New York [www.manischewitzwine.com/]. Their site boasts the company's traditional brands such as Concord Grape, Blackberry, Loganberry and Extra Heavy Malaga. The company even offers an online virtual tour to show you how their products are made [www.manischewitzwine.com/tour/tour.htm].

Over on the west coast, you'll find newer winemakers like Ernie Weir of Napa, California's Hagafen Wineries [www.webwinery.com/Hagafen/]. One of my favourite kosher wine Web sites belongs to Gan Eden Wines and its only permanent employee, Craig Winchel, CEO [www.ganeden.com/]. In addition to describing the wines that he produces and bottles, Winchel has also written an essay about rediscovering Judaism and living a kosher lifestyle in Sebastopol, California. And you can read more about the evolution of kosher wine in an article from Wine Spectator [www.winespectator.com/Wine/Spectator/Feature/kosher].

I found a delightful piece of Jewish wine trivia on the Web site of California winemakers Martini & Prati [www.martiniprati.com/history.htm]. The Martini Wine Company was one of the few wineries in the United States to remain in operation during Prohibition. When Narciso Martini found out that rabbis were allowed 50 gallons of wine per year for religious purposes, "he shipped as much as 10,000 gallons of wine a year – all perfectly legal – to rabbis in New York for the duration of this period. 'It's amazing,' Elmo, his son, once recalled, 'how many more rabbis there suddenly were in New York during Prohibition.'"

So let us raise a glass to past and future popularity of kosher wines.

From Bay Street to Seaton House: A portrait of one homeless Jew

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I've become the wise old Jew of Seaton House," pronounces the 61-year-old man between bites of his spaghetti-and-meatballs lunch. "I've become a hero."

At the very least, he's having his 15 minutes of fame as the result of two recent articles in the National Post, the focus of which was a modern and tragic anomaly: A Jewish one-time financial whiz – a respected Bay Street analyst who once earned $500,000 a year and drove a Lexus to work from the suburbs – has landed among the homeless.

The man, who does not want his name used, says he's been "reduced to tears" by what the Post called a "flood" of offers to help the day after the story appeared last month.

"Well, a 'flood' is a bit of an insult to Noah," the man cracks. "The last I heard, they had seven responses. Mostly what I got were a lot of sucrose sentiments.

"But to say I was flattered is an understatement. I guess I earned the respect of my colleagues to a degree I hadn't realized myself."

Former business associates, some of whom the man has not seen or heard from in years, "popped out of the woodwork" with offers to help, including at least one who gave him cash. The Post reported that lawyers, social workers and brokers called in to find out how they can come to the man's aid.

"They said, 'Of course we remember you. You were the best analyst on the street,'" he says. "Now, I'm being treated a bit better than most."

That's worth something at Seaton House, a city-owned men's hostel that houses 500 indigents, many of whom are alcoholics, drug addicts, mentally ill, or sometimes, all three.

The former analyst has lived there since late January. His only real scare came when a man physically attacked him "and called me a goddamned Jew for putting my glasses on 'his' window sill. Some of these guys would sell their mothers for a cigarette."

Asked whether Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) has helped him, he shrugs. "Except for two or three lunches, they haven't. If the Jewish community can find me another place to live, I'd jump at the chance."

He won't go out in the rain or snow because he's afraid he'll ruin his only pair of shoes.

He spends his days playing solitaire, which he says keeps his fingers and mind nimble. He is plagued by a host of health problems, including six past heart attacks, cataracts, angina, blood problems, shortness of breath and an immune disorder that could leave him vulnerable to potentially fatal diseases. He takes blood thinners, antibiotics and a variety of other medications.

He gets by on monthly welfare and disability. He buys whatever food he can. Bananas "calm my stomach." His sole luxury is buying The Economist magazine. Despite his lot in life, his appearance is clean, his hair combed fastidiously. He can't walk too fast, "but I walk as much and as fast as I can because it pumps oxygen to my mind."

And a quick, expansive mind it still is. "I'm an autodidact," he says, enunciating the words carefully. "I'm fundamentally an academic and bookworm. When I was six, I read Black Beauty three times, and I was hooked. I sold my library of 7,000 books, and I can honestly say that I read almost all of them."

He holds forth on Israeli politics, etymology (the origins of words), effortlessly quotes philosopher George Santayana and author Arthur Koestler, and liberally sprinkles his conversations with Yiddishisms.

"Yiddish is my first language," says the man, who was born in Montreal and raised in a working class area "two steps removed" from Mordecai Richler's famous Jewish neighbourhood. "My parents, who were born in Galicia, spoke Polish or Russian when they didn't want me to understand what they were saying."

He's an assimilated Jew, he stresses. "I've had a few brushes with death and I haven't called on God yet."

A Grade 9 dropout, he helped run the family shoe store before taking a job as an analyst with Royal Trust Co.

JF&CS responds to the problem

TORONTO — For Lillian Freedman, nothing has changed about the Jewish community's approach to homelessness.

Freedman, a freelance social worker, made a splash three years ago when she found several homeless Jews. Her lone crusade more or less shamed Jewish Family & Child Service into setting up its first-ever task force on the Jewish homeless.

The agency retained Freedman on a short-term contract, and she found five homeless Jews. In the ensuing months, the JF&CS task force said it located 27 Jewish homeless, who were accommodated "in appropriate housing." Others were given emergency funds to avoid eviction.

But according to JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe, the homeless committee disbanded after its recommendations were implemented.

"The view from the street is that if you're homeless and Jewish, not much has changed," says Freedman.

JF&CS can loan first and last months' rent on affordable housing units and tops up welfare payments, "but in terms of really responding, they're not set up for it."

Freedman has long advocated a separate, crisis-oriented communal agency to deal with the homeless. That idea has been rejected by JF&CS, which has said it can deal with the issue within existing services.

Simon Kalkstein, a JF&CS social worker who is dealing with the former analyst's case, says he's been trying to get the man into a social housing unit.

In the meantime, Kalkstein said, the man has turned down funds for groceries, saying he's fine for now thanks to help from his one-time Bay Street colleagues.

One Jewish lawyer has reportedly offered to help the man for free, in a claim against his last employer's insurer, which refused disability coverage.

Obituary

Kopacsi was a Righteous Gentile

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sandor Kopacsi, who saved the lives of seven Jews in Nazi-occupied Hungary and won Israel's highest praises for his heroism, died here recently. He was 78.

A one-time chief of police in Budapest, he was also a political prisoner and a janitor. But always a hero.

He was 23 when the Nazis invaded Hungary in 1944. After witnessing the persecution of his Jewish friends in his home town of Miskolc, northeast of Budapest, he began hiding Jews with relatives.

When that became too risky, he approached his parents, and they rented a house on the edge of a forest. There, the family hid seven Jews and seven political prisoners in the basement, spiriting them food and even weapons.

To avoid suspicion, the family bought some pigs. Every day, Sandor went off to feed them, but instead, gave the food to his charges.

After the war, Kopacsi became a policeman and in 1952, was named police chief of Budapest. But in 1956, the Soviet Union invaded the country to crush a student-led revolution. Kopacsi refused his Communist overlords' orders to open fire on demonstrators, and was sentenced to six-and-a-half years in prison, two of them in solitary confinement.

Released under a general amnesty in 1963, he completed law school but was not permitted to practise, and worked instead as a lathe operator. After years of struggle, he and his wife Ibolya left Hungary in 1975 to join their daughter in Toronto.

Kopacsi often remarked that he witnessed first-hand the excesses of both fascism and communism.

A modest and unassuming man, Kopacsi, together with his parents Jozsef and Ilona (posthumously) were awarded Righteous Among the Nations status by Israel in 1989. At a Yom Hashoah service in Toronto that May, he was presented with a specially struck medal by Israel's consul general.

He leaves his wife, daughter Judith and two grandchildren.

ארץ אחרת

לפני מספר שבועות הציג לפנֵי נעם, שליח השומר הצעיר, את גלינו הראשון של כתב עת חדש שיצא בישראל- "ארץ אחרת", שכותרת המשנה שלו היא "על ישראליות ויהדות". "ארץ אחרת" מביא את קולה של ישראל הסובלנית, זו שמדברת ואינה צועקת, זו שמקשיבה לבני כל העדות, הדתות, החילונים ושומרי המצוות. וכך פותחת העורכת במבי שלו את הגליון הראשון: "רצח רבין הוא קו פרשת חמים של החברה הישראלית...ישראל שקמה אל נוקד החמישה בנובמבר 1995 היתה לחברה אחרת. לכאורה לא נשתנה הרבה מאז....חירבויות העמוקות, המחלוקות האידיאולוגיות בין שמאל לימין ובין דתיים לחילונים, בחלק מן המקרים אף הועצמו...שישים שנה אחרי השואה, יותר מחמישים שנה לאחר הקמת המדינה, מתפנים רבים מביניו לעסוק בשאלה: מי אנחנו היהודים ששבו לציון- אנו חשים שכל המגורים הישראלים הגיעו למבוי סתום. שום מגזר אינו מסוגל להתקדם לעבר יעדיו ללא עזרה מישראלים המצויים בעולמות אחרים". "ארץ אחרת" יעקוב אחר אותם ישראלים החפצים להרחיב את גבולות זהותם ומוכנים לשם כך להאזין גם לקולות שהם מתקשים לשמוע..."

ואכן, זוהי קריאה מרתקת של דיעות חדשות על ישראלים חילוניים שמחפשים את דרכם ליחידות מחוץ למסד הדתי, דיעותיו של ד"ר בוזגלו, מרצה צעיר לפילוסופיה, שמאמין שלימודי המתימטיקה הם הבסיס למלחמה במצוקה של עדות המזרח. לצידם ראיון עם מנהל תלמוד תורה, אב לשבעה, שמספר על ידידות העמוקה למשורר חצ'כי צ'סלב מילוש, ועל הדרך שעשה מהספרות והשירה אל הישיבה, ומהישיבה אל השירה. אם אתם רוצים להכיר את ישראל החדשה שמבעבצת מבעד לכוחניות והצעקנות וחוסר הסובלנות, בקשו שישלחו לכם את "ארץ אחרת".

מזוזות

יהודי עשיר בנה לעצמו טירה ענקית עם חמישים חדרים, עם מרצפות הדוּדות וחרסינה איטלקית וכל השאר. יום לפני חנוכת הבית הוא נכח לחרדתו ששכח לשים מזוזות. הזמין בעל מלאכה משובח, הורה לו לשים מזוזות והזהיר אותו: "אני ואבוי לך אם זה יישאר חריצים או יפגע בצבעי".

חזר אותו עשיר הביתה, שמח לראות שהעבודה נעשתה על הצד הטוב ביותר והעניק לבעל המלאכה טיפ שָמֵן. הודה לו בעל המלאכה ולפני שיצא מן הבית אמר לו: " אה, כמעט ששכחתי להגיד לך-לפני שתלישי אותן, הוצאתי מן המזוזות האלה את כל תעודות האחריות שהיו בתוכן ושמתי אותן במגֵרה במטבח...".

שעת נפש-אלימות מחית אחרת

הבן שלי משחק חוקי קרח כמו רבים מילדי טורונטו, ובגיל שתים עשרה מותר להם לראשונה להתגנש אחד בשני, מה שהם קוראים "בדיקת גוף". האלימות שמתגלה על המגרש (ומותרת לפי כללי המשחק) היא משהו משהו. אבל לא על זה אני רוצה לדבר, כי זה מה שאפשר לצפות מבנים בני שתים עשרה שהטסטוסטרון מפעפע בהם. מעניינת אותי יותר תגובת החוזרים, ומדהימה אותי תגובת חלק מהאמהות, שצווחות בעוגב כשחבן שלהן/ם שולח לקרשים שחקן יריב. אבל ברגע שמישהו נוגע בילד שלהם/ן, ואפילו לפי החוקים- נשמעות צווחות של השמדת עם . האלימות שחבויה באנשים ידועה היטב לחוקרי הפסיכולוגיה והפסיכיאטריה, אבל תמיד מפתיע מחדש לראות איך שהיא יוצאת החוצה כשיש נֵרוי מתאים. אימו של סיסרא מחכה לו בחלון שיחזור מנצח, ומה בראש ציפיותיה?- "רחם רחמתיים לצואר גבר"- שיהרוג את חגבריים ויאנוס את הנשים. אלה הם כוחות חזקים, שחבויים היטב בשכבות של תרבות מדֻרנית...עד שפורצת מלחמה ביוגוסלוויה ואנשים אנסים את בנות שכניהם, או עד שמתחדשת האינתיפאדה ופלשתינאים שוחטים תיילים ישראלים בידיהם ומראים את ידיהם המגואלות בדם לכל העולם. המשך שעת נפש על אלימות בטור הבא. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Greater Toronto Area

Portrait of a homeless Jew

In 1979, divorced and with no children, he moved to Toronto and began a remarkable rise in the financial world, working at three brokerage firms in 20 years.

In short order, he made a name for himself as a specialist in the steel industry. Such media outlets as the Wall Street Journal, the New York Times and the Financial Post quoted his opinions literally hundreds of times.

"I was a workaholic. I worked 16 hours a day, seven days a week. If I took a Saturday morning off, it was a big deal."

At his peak, he was earning a half-million dollars a year, "and I wasn't a big spender." But bad health, combined with personal problems and an $83,000 fine for tax evasion, resulted in bankruptcy.

With declining health came declining income. Two years ago, he was evicted from his apartment and wound up living at a motel. Last summer, his employer put him on medical disability but the insurer refused coverage, saying the man was well enough to work.

In January, he was evicted from another apartment. This time, with no money and only a few meagre belongings, he chose to be taken to St. Michael's Hospital, which sent him to Seaton House.

"Until then, I had never heard of Seaton House," he says. The Post articles came about, he explains, as a result of his desire to expose the "Dickensian" conditions there. Despite that, "I have to say I've been treated well there. It's a remarkable place." Thanks to an obvious love and strong command of English, he's teaching the language to other residents.

He says he's "amazed" by the people who have come forward with offers of help, and then, perhaps musing on his fate, chokes up, his words quivering. "I never robbed anyone. I never hurt anyone. I never lied to or cheated a client."

Asked what his plans are, he dabs his eyes with a napkin and says, "I stopped making plans a long time ago."

Community volunteer remembered

TORONTO — Harold Lederman, a well-known community volunteer, was remembered last week as an unassuming yet effective activist. Lederman died March 6 of cancer. He was 69.

"He was generous with his time and money," recalled Lederman's brother-in-law, Gerry Ross. "He was a low-key guy but his enthusiasm was infectious. He managed to involve a large group of people in the things that interested him."

Lederman's two major communal causes were United Jewish Appeal and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. He and Gerry Sheff co-chaired UJA's 1988 campaign, and in recent years, Lederman was chair of the Baycrest Centre Foundation. He also championed the funding of research into prostate cancer at Princess Margaret Hospital.

"He was a very special guy," recalled Sheff. "He was very buttoned-down but he dealt with things in a decisive way."

The lanky, bearded Lederman was born in Toronto to humble beginnings. His mother came from Odessa, Russia and his father from Poland.

With no formal business training, Lederman and partner Leo Goldhar began Sterling Tile and Carpet in the mid-1950s, and it grew into a successful business. In recent years, Lederman invested in a variety of community endeavours.

"I'll remember him for his dignity, optimism and energy," said Ross, who delivered a eulogy at the funeral held at Temple Sinai.

"Harold was honest, direct and astute in his advice," said Mark Gryfe, president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation. "Above all, he was a good man…a mensch."

Lederman is survived by sister Pauline Ross, daughter Lisa Brown, son Richard Lederman, and five grandchildren, ranging in age from seven to 21.

His wife of 45 years, Shirley, pre-deceased him in 1998. –R.C.

Seminary students take part in JTS Shabbat

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Instead of the usual Saturday morning sermon by Rabbi Howard Morrison on Mar. 24, congregants at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue will hear an address by a 19-year-old undergraduate student at New York's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS).

The school, best known as the Conservative movement's training ground for rabbis and cantors, also encompasses a number of other academic programs.

Judith Horwitz, a JTS Talmud major in a double degree program that includes music studies at Barnard College, will be in Toronto as part of the JTS Shabbat program, in which over 100 congregations across North America are taking part.

Although JTS Shabbat was held officially on March 2 and 3, congregations and students had the flexibility to arrange for more convenient dates. The Beth Emeth weekend was chosen to coincide with Shabbat Across America/Canada, a multi-denominational project of the National Jewish Outreach Program.

> 'Opportunity to teach and preach'

For Rabbi Morrison, who became spiritual leader of the traditional Conservative congregation last year, the JTS Shabbat is a very familiar program. Before his own ordination in 1987, he spent a Shabbat in Long Island, N.Y., as part of the pilot program in conjunction with JTS' centennial year, 1986.

"I had a great time," he recalls. "For me it was an opportunity to teach and preach in front of a congregation. It was a great experience."

He hopes that Horwitz' presence in Toronto – where she will also speak at Friday night dinner and on an informal basis to children and other segments of the congregation – will familiarize congregants with his alma mater and "reinforce that JTS is not only a centre for training rabbis and cantors, but that it offers a full program of Jewish studies."

The rabbi also anticipates that Horwitz' visit will attest to the fact there are young people – "regular people" – who have an interest in Jewish studies at a sophisticated level.

Horwitz, who hopes to become a geriatrician, says the seminary has many things to offer students who "don't have any interest in the rabbinate." An alumna of a Solomon Schechter day school in Detroit, Horwitz attended public high school, but wanted to continue her Jewish studies for her own personal education and enlightenment.

She finds it interesting to visit different Conservative communities because of the variety found within the movement. While the seminary has undergone a tremendous shift to the left theologically in the past two decades – approximately half its rabbinical students now are female – Horwitz, who reads Torah regularly, has no objection to worshipping in a non-egalitarian setting.

"Not at all," she replied, when asked whether she might find the concept foreign or theologically unacceptable. And she said she's not alone. "There are even some Orthodox students at the seminary. You can find students from all sorts of synagogues."

Jill Borodin, a Toronto native who will be ordained this May, spent an early JTS Shabbat weekend at Halifax's Shaar Shalom Congregation, likely the only Canadian Conservative congregation to have had a woman rabbi as spiritual leader (for about five years, until three years ago). Services are currently being led by Yakov Feig of the Atlantic Jewish Council, as the congregation has been without a rabbi since last August.

Borodin's visit was "a nice breath of fresh air," said Nancy Cieplinski, president of the 145-family synagogue. "We enjoyed her energy and her wonderful presentation style, and her message was easy to understand and interesting."

It was nice to have a young female as a role model, she added.

For Borodin, it was nice to be back in Halifax, where she began her university studies 10 years ago. Like Horwitz, she enjoys meeting and interacting with different Jewish communities. A bonus of her trip to Halifax was the opportunity to reconnect with the Romanian cantor of the local Orthodox synagogue, and his wife, with whom she became friends when working for six months with the Romanian Jewish Community on a Joint Distribution Committee program part way through her rabbinic training.

In addition to meeting with youngsters in Halifax, Borodin gave a d'var Torah, led services and spoke of her own spiritual path, having grown up in a Reform synagogue before she became observant. In fact, Shaar Shalom was the first Canadian Conservative synagogue she ever davened in.

The JTS Shabbat is good for everybody, said program co-ordinator Rebecca Jacobs. For students, it's a way to "find out what things are like in the real world." It's also good for JTS as an institution, putting a human face on the school, she noted. "It's a way to get a sense of what this place is all about."

Doctoring with a difference: JDC in Ethiopia

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After 13 years of living in Ethiopia, Dr. Richard (Rick) Hodes spent time in West Palm Beach, Fla. recently, as part of a three-week speaking tour that took him to Toronto last week.

The thing that struck him there, he said, was that all the television ads seemed to be about liposuction and hair transplants, in contrast to some of his patients' common concerns, like tuberculosis, intestinal parasites or complications of HIV.

Dr. Rick Hodes

The 47-year-old native of Long Island, N.Y. has served since 1990 as medical director for the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) in Ethiopia, based in Addis Ababa.

Hodes – who is also known as Museh, the Amharic version of Moshe – runs two clinics, each with 8,000 patients. He also taught medical school in Addis Ababa for more than two years, and headed the JDC medical team in Zaire in 1994, setting up a hospital in response to the crisis in Rwanda.

An observant Jew, Hodes was studying at a yeshiva in Israel, following his teaching stint in Addis Ababa, when he contacted the JDC to offer his services helping Ethiopian Jews.

Initially hired for six weeks, he doesn't see his level of observance as a barrier to living in Ethiopia. "I just think this is what I should be doing as a human being," he said in an interview at the Lipa Green Building before addressing staff of UJA FEDERATION, of which the JDC is an overseas partner supporting Jews in 60 countries. "It's not a problem. I pray three times a day, I don't eat meat, I keep Shabbat, I put on tfillin, all that stuff."

Hodes affiliates with a small local community of Jews from the South Yemenite city of Aden. (The Adenite Jewish community, with its wealthy businesspeople, should not be confused with the Ethiopian Jewish community, most of whom – about 70,000 – are now in Israel.)

The Falash Mura who have applied to go to Israel are leaving at the rate of about 100 a week, Hodes said. To the best of his knowledge, they are entering Israel as non-Jews. Those who have not left Ethiopia are living in rented huts or rooms, he said.

His own living quarters consist of a downtown cottage that he shares with five Ethiopian children and young adults whom he has taken in. (Ethiopia has the second-largest number of AIDS orphans in the world, after Uganda, and there are a lot of non-AIDS orphans as well, Hodes noted.)

"On a good day I have running water, electricity, a toilet that works and a phone that works. On a bad day, I don't have anything. There's usually some problem. We haven't had cooking gas for months. We cook with an electric hot plate on the kitchen floor or else a kerosene burner."

Hodes' biggest challenge, he said, is pacing himself to prevent burnout. In addition to his JDC duties, he volunteers as a doctor at Mother Teresa's mission, which serves 500 people at any one time.

From a medical standpoint, he faces the challenge of keeping his patients "alive and basically well." As he noted in his speech that morning, he's already outlived the average Ethiopian lifespan of 43 years.

His population, he noted, has "well below half the death rate" of other Ethiopians, a testament to the success of the program, which includes a meal program for malnourished children.

Although Hodes was involved in Operation Solomon, the 1991 airlift of more than 14,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel in 36 hours, when he played a role in getting patients from their hospital beds to the airplanes – in one case literally throwing a child over his shoulder and driving off with him – Hodes made it clear that his role is strictly that of a doctor.

He has no say in who gets to go to Israel, but he has to give potential immigrants the medical okay to fly there, he tells patients. Often that serves as a powerful incentive for those with active tuberculosis who do not initially want to take medication.

Coincidentally, it was a Canadian connection that first led Hodes to Ethiopia in the mid-1980s as a faculty member of McGill University on an overseas program for six months. He stayed on for another two years, teaching at the medical school in Addis Ababa on a Fulbright scholarship.

A graduate of the University of Rochester medical school, he studied Internal Medicine in Baltimore, at Johns Hopkins University.

While he admits to having "not a lot of common ground" with his North American colleagues, his bottom line is, "I really like what I'm doing. I really feel useful."

Program puts focus on Jerusalem

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chabad @ Flamingo, in conjunction with the One Jerusalem movement, is presenting a one-day educational event on the historical and spiritual ties of Jewish people to the city of Jerusalem.

The Ernest Manson Lubavitch Centre will open its doors to the public on Sunday, March 18, beginning at 9:45 a.m. for seminars and audio-visual presentations on the holy city. Most of the day's events, divided into three sessions of three hours each, are geared to adults, while an afternoon Passport to Jerusalem program is aimed at children.

The event, called Next Year in Jerusalem, is designed to enhance the intellectual and spiritual attachment of the Jewish community to the holy city, said Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of the centre. Nine presenters will delve into the mystical, historical and halachic aspects of the city.

"In this way, the hope is that it will be all-encompassing, embracing the scholarly tradition to bring forth wholesome emotional feelings" for Jerusalem, he said.

The program was inspired in part by the recent One Jerusalem rally at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, which was attended by close to 2,500 participants. The rally came as a grassroots response to reports the government of former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak was considering relinquishing sovereignty over parts of the Old City of Jerusalem.

"Ten years ago, no one contemplated giving up Jerusalem," Rabbi Kaplan stated.

There was a tremendous impact on the Jewish world when Jerusalem was "placed on the table," and while it is no longer subject to negotiation, the mere fact it was contemplated weakened the Jewish resolve about the city, he believes.

"The only way to rekindle that spark of sentiment and feeling is to educate people about the importance of Jerusalem to the Jewish people," he said.

"My gut feeling is that... there will be a spillover effect into the community, intensifying the affiliation and connection of the Jews of Toronto to Jerusalem," he added.

The Ernest Manson Lubavitch Centre is located at 8001 Bathurst St. at the corner of Flamingo Road. For more information, call 905-763-4040.

A land littered with mines pays the price

By JESSAMYN WALDMAN

Guest Voice

I thought I was aware of the effects of war, but my recent trip to Bosnia immediately brought home some of the residual effects that make recovery from conflict nearly impossible.

As I sat in my hotel room in Sarajevo two weeks ago, I became frightened. I was in the capital of a nation that was decimated five years ago by a war; I had watched the escalating conflict in Israel via live feed on CNN. I could not rid myself of a feeling of doom in my stomach.

Sarajevo is referred to as the Jerusalem of Europe; the close proximity of the distinct religious groups that live there make the parallels between the two cities hard to ignore. In the Turkish quarter, there are beautiful mosques down the cobblestone street from a historic synagogue, near to a huge Orthodox church that is beside a Catholic church. In few cities around the world is there this kind of intermingling of cultures. And in few cities around the world is there the potential for the kind of polarization that can lead to neighbours killing each other.

* * *

On my two visits to Israel, I was fortunate enough to be going – as do many Jewish Canadians – to celebrate. However, my role in Bosnia-Herzegovina was different. As a youth mine action ambassador, I was observing the war's effects in this small landlocked country – specifically the devastating effects that land mines are having in a society that is working hard to overcome the conflict of the past decade.

My delegation and I had a chance meeting with a family who, unlike many Bosnians (Bosnian-Muslims) who were internally displaced during the war, had recovered the home and the land that was theirs before the war. They lived in Lilaci, a village that warranted our visit because it was one of hundreds of mined communities that had been effectively de-mined. A multi-ethnic, international effort of a local NGO, a foreign aid agency, foreign military and the reconciliated entity armies from Bosnia-Herzegovina had demined the village and made it possible for this family to return home.

Within minutes of our arrival, Rosanna, the family's matriarch, had invited us for coffee. Rosanna had returned to this village with her husband, two children, daughter-in-law and two tiny grandchildren. The family was working hard to recover some of what they had lost and the progress was evident.

After we had finished our coffee (it tasted like the Turkish coffee that I enjoyed in the shuk in Jerusalem), Rosanna showed us a line of mine tape behind her house, 50 metres away. A thin red plastic tape, the type that you see surrounding scenes of murders in detective movies, represented the end of their newly re-patriated freedom. When the de-mining was done in this community, the budget only allowed for the area immediately around the houses; it could not be extended to the surrounding fields. I was horrified when I realized that Rosanna lived in constant fear that one of her beautiful grandchildren might wander after a ball, past the mine tape, into an area littered with land mines.

* * *

The war in Bosnia ended 5 years ago, but with between 750,000 and a million land mines estimated to be still in the ground, the amount of work left is intimidating. People in Bosnia, as do people in Cambodia, Angola, Ethiopia and Nicaragua, live in fear of battles that have already been fought. What concerns me is how the landscape in Israel will look in 10 years from now.

Israel has not signed the Ottawa Treaty, an international agreement that has been signed and ratified by 108 countries making the use, production, stockpiling and transfer of land mines illegal. Although Israel no longer produces anti-personnel land mines, it has sufficient stockpiles of mines to "adequately respond to a crisis," as an official told the Land Mine Monitor Report in an interview in 1999. The Israeli army has used land mines around borders, military outposts and sensitive areas such as water stations and electrical power facilities. When peace is established in the Middle East, civilians will return to these areas. However, land mines cannot tell the difference between the foot of a soldier and a child. I hope that when peace finally does come to the region, there will not be any more grandmothers like Rosanna who live with the real fear that their grandchild will encounter an insidious weapon left over from a war.

There have already been hundreds of mine casualties in Israel and the surrounding regions. If it is necessary to use force to protect citizens, let us be sure that the grandchildren of those citizens will be able to live safely. Israel should commit, as have 108 countries from around the world, to stop the use of this weapon. Otherwise, when the conflict is over, apart from hardships caused by the necessity to repair the damaged economy and infrastructure, Israelis are going to bear the burden of explosives in the ground.

As I have seen in Bosnia, removing land mines is a slow and expensive process. Israel should act with prudence now to minimize damage in the future.

Rabbis talk to students about pluralism

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish pluralism was the focus at Can't We All Just Get Along? Maybe Yes, Maybe No: An Interdenominational Dialogue, a recent panel discussion organized by Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning; Koach, the university arm of the Conservative movement; and Kesher, Reform students on campus.

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Rabbi Jay Kelman, the associate rabbi of Beth Jacob Congregation, spoke for the Orthodox community. Rabbi Neal Loevinger, associate director of Kolel, for the Conservative community, and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, for the Reform community.

Citing sources such as the Talmud and Maimonides, Rabbi Kelman demonstrated that different forms of Judaism have existed for longer than we often imagine. He said that the issue has been pushed to the forefront recently because the Jewish community has changed dramatically in the past 200 years.

Although there is "a difficult tension" between the various forms of Jewish practice, Rabbi Kelman feels nurturing that relationship is necessary because of "the mitzvah of Ahavat Yisrael, of loving another Jew."

Rabbi Neal Loevinger

He went on to say that "intellectual honesty is important, [so is] our friendship... and maintaining our way of life.

"How we balance all three is the struggle we have to deal with. There's no easy answer."

Rabbi Loevinger admitted his position is difficult because, "We want to make the changes that we think will bring people in, but we are also a halachic movement, a movement that grounds itself in Jewish law, so there are red lines for us that we will not cross."

Rabbi Loevinger indicated that pluralism means "believing that you are right, but acknowledging at least the possibility that you might be wrong." Respect for others is critical, he continued. "Sometimes we jump too quickly to discount the rigorous thinking... other people have done."

As long as we speak "in a language of Torah," we can all get along, said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, even though "we may be speaking in different dialects."

Goldstein challenged the idea of unity and suggested moving towards an acceptance of pluralism. "Jewish unity presupposes that there is one communal standard to which everybody will buy into eventually... Jewish pluralism assumes we may continue to agree to disagree forever, but what we'll do is make room for different opinions."

Many nodded in agreement when she begged, "Please do not judge any denomination by the worst members of that denomination."

Rabbi Goldstein also argued that using the notion of klal Yisrael, the whole community of Israel, as a premise and slogan for Jewish unity can be "a very inclusive device [as well as] a very exclusive device" since it is a subjective term. Or, as she explained, "my klal Yisrael includes the religious equality of women," whereas others may draw the boundaries of community differently.

All three rabbis noted that the role of women in Jewish worship is the most problematic in terms of the balance between tradition, law and current society. Although women have full rights and equality in the secular world, Orthodoxy does not count women in a minyan, for example.

Although women have a distinct role, Rabbi Kelman said, "it is not a public role" as defined by Halachah, a "divine system," which he feels he can only interpret and not change.

Rabbi Goldstein added that leaders of the Reform movement may interpret the laws to ensure that women are equal participants in every aspect of Judaism.

Meanwhile, the Conservative movement, Rabbi Loevinger explained, is struggling to "re-understand the context" of many Jewish texts in order to balance tradition and, for example, to find a place for gays and lesbians.

Rabbi Goldstein called for a breaking down of the "ladder model of Judaism," where Orthodox is understood to be on the top, Conservative in the middle, Reform on the bottom, and other forms of Judaism, such as Reconstructionist, often without a place at all.

Instead, she suggested, "We are in a big circle," because "many times in your life you're going to find yourself in a different place... If you say to yourself, 'I am responsible for the Judaism of the future,' then we can all have a lot more dialogue together."

Passover Food Ideas

Daphna cooks from scratch

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Daphna Rabinovitch, associate food editor at Canadian Living magazine and co-host of Canadian Living Cooks on Food Network Canada, is a scratch cook.

"Even during Passover when there is a plethora of products on the market, I try not to use a mix or a box. I am very much a purist."

Rabinovitch grew up in Montreal, and received her chef's papers from a professional cooking school in California. Among other positions before joining Canadian Living, she taught classic Italian cooking in Tuscany, and worked as a pastry chef.

Passover, she says, has always been her favourite holiday. "My mother and grandmother were excellent cooks, and I always looked forward to the holiday, with all the wonderful food that comes with it. I even love the matzah."

Typical family seders, she says, brimmed with traditional foods such as sweet gefilte fish, brisket, chicken and matzah kugel – still her responsibility today.

Her family was "way ahead of their time with regards to culinary skills, and they always cooked seasonally. A Rabinovitch Passover tradition is to use the seder to herald the changing of the seasons. Asparagus and leek soup is an easy-to-make, light puree that says spring."

She still looks forward to seders with her extended family – she is married with a 2½-year-old son – and has begun to introduce some Sephardi flavours into the menu.

"I make brisket because my husband loves it, but a favourite recipe includes cinnamon, cumin and dried fruit. I like to bring in the old with something new."

She has served raspberry purée "as an unexpected decadent ending to the seder meal, and along with a sponge and chiffon cake, my chocolate indulgence cake is always a hit. All of these can be topped with pareve whipped topping."

Her published recipes are "tested until they're perfect. Sometimes the taste panel tests a recipe four or five times before we're happy with it.

"A 'super-taster' can discern a tiny amount of sweetness or bitterness. They can also tell if a recipe is good, even if it is not to their liking; that is an essential skill when testing a recipe."

Here, Rabinovitch offers some of her own recipes.

Stuffed breast of veal.

IRON-RICH ROLLED BREAST OF VEAL

Parsley, always placed on a seder plate, makes an appearance in this roast. You can use two breasts of veal instead of brisket; overlap them slightly to form an 18x8-inch rectangle.

1 tbsp. olive oil
1 small onion, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
2 cups chopped fresh parsley
1 cup chopped roasted red pepper
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. chopped fresh thyme (or ½ tsp. dried)
Salt and pepper
Pinch of hot pepper flakes

Continued on page 27

Soup adds some spring to dinner

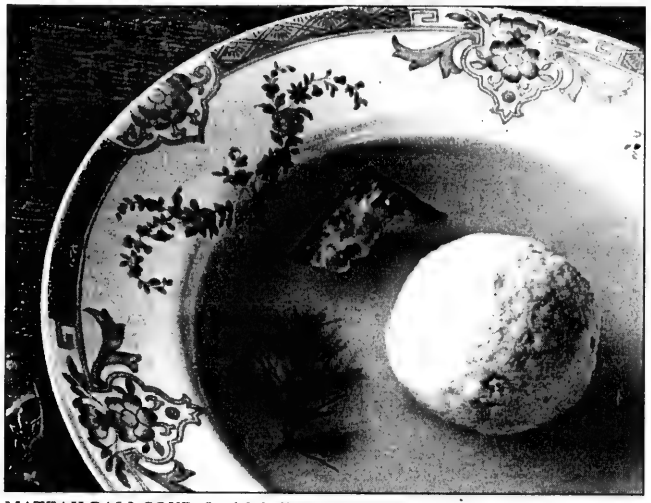
2 tbsp. matzah cake meal
1 veal brisket (2½ lbs.)
½ cup Passover white wine
½ cup chicken stock
4 tsp. potato starch

In skillet, heat 1 tsp. of the oil over medium heat; cook onion and garlic, stirring for 3 minutes or just until softened. Stir in parsley, red pepper, lemon juice, thyme, ¼ tsp. each salt and pepper, and hot pepper flakes; cook, stirring, for about 3 minutes or until parsley is wilted. Remove from heat; stir in matzah meal. Let cool slightly.

Lay veal brisket flat on work surface, so grain runs parallel to edge of counter. Spread filling over top. Starting at side nearest edge of counter, roll up to enclose filling; using kitchen string tie at 1-inch intervals. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Wipe out skillet; heat remaining oil over medium-high heat. Brown roast on all sides; transfer to roasting pan. Pour wine and stock into skillet. Bring to boil, scraping up any brown bits; pour into roasting pan. Cover tightly and bake at 325, basting every 30 minutes, for about 1½ hours or until meat thermometer registers 150F.

Transfer meat to cutting board and tent with foil; let stand for 10 minutes. Dissolve potato starch in 2 tbsp. water; stir into roasting pan. Bring to boil, whisking constantly; cook, whisking, for about 3 minutes or until slightly thickened. Slice meat thinly; serve with sauce. Makes 8 servings. Per serving: about 255 calories, 30g protein, 11g fat, 7g carbohydrate, a good source of iron.



MATZAH BALL SOUP: Jewish holidays and many Shabbat dinners traditionally start with chicken soup and knaidlach.

ASPARAGUS AND LEEK SOUP

Be sure to wash leeks thoroughly under cold running water, spraying the water in between all layers to rinse away any grit.

3 leeks, white and pale parts only
2 lbs. asparagus, trimmed
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tsp. grated lemon rind
5 cups chicken stock

Coarsely chop leeks. Cut asparagus into 1½-inch lengths; set aside.

In a large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat; cook leeks, stirring occasionally, for about 5 minutes. Reduce heat to medium-low and cook for 10 minutes longer or until very soft. Stir in lemon rind; cook for 1 minute. Add asparagus, stock and 1 cup water; bring to boil. Reduce heat; cover and simmer for 10 minutes or until asparagus are tender. Remove and set aside 1 cup of the asparagus tips. In blender, purée remaining soup in batches until very smooth. (Soup can be covered and refrigerated for up to 1 day.)

Return soup to pot; reheat over low heat. Ladle into bowls; garnish over low served asparagus tips. Makes 8 servings. Per serving: about 88 calories, 6g protein, 5g total fat (1g saturated fat), 8g carbohydrate, 3g fibre, 0mg cholesterol, 500mg sodium. Percent RDI: 3% calcium, 10% iron, 5% vit. A, 18% vit. C, 59% folate.

BRISKET BRAISED IN WINE WITH DRIED FRUIT AND POTATOES

Dried apricots and prunes not only sweeten the sauce but also break down slightly, helping to thicken it. Make the dish a day ahead to allow flavours to combine and to ease preparations.

MATZAH CHICKEN PIE: A spin on the traditional use of matzah.

Cook with Sephardi flavours

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 onions, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. paprika
¼ tsp. each ground ginger and coriander
½ tsp. ground cumin
¼ tsp. each turmeric, cinnamon, cayenne and salt
Pinch of pepper
3½ cups chicken stock
1½ cups dry red wine
3 tbsp. liquid honey
2 bay leaves
1 single side brisket (4 lbs.)
1 cup dried apricots
⅔ cup pitted prunes
2 each baking and sweet potatoes, peeled and cut in chunks

In large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat; cook onions and garlic, stirring often, for 15 minutes or until very soft.

Meanwhile, in bowl, combine paprika, ginger, coriander, cumin, turmeric, cinnamon, cayenne, salt and pepper; stir half into onion mixture. Cook, stirring, for 30 seconds. Add stock, wine, honey and bay leaves; bring to boil. Remove from heat and let cool for 5 minutes.

Trim all but thin layer of fat from brisket. Rub remaining spice mixture over nonfat side. Place in large roasting pan, fat side up. Scatter apricots and prunes around brisket. Pour stock mixture over brisket. Cover with foil and bake at 325 for 3 hours, basting every 30 minutes.

Place potatoes around meat. Cover and bake, basting every 30 minutes, for 1 to 1½ hours or until very tender. Let cool slightly. Cover and refrigerate for up to 24 hours. Remove solid fat from pan. Remove meat; slice thinly across grain. Return to pan; cover and reheat in oven at 325 for 1 hour, basting 3 times. Arrange on platter. Remove bay leaves. Spoon juices and fruit over top; place potatoes alongside. Makes 8 servings. Per serving: about 534 calories, 40g protein, 23g total fat (7g sat. fat), 44g carbohydrate, 5g fibre, 91mg cholesterol, 505mg sodium. Percent RDI: 5% calcium, 39% iron, 72% vit. A, 23% vit. C, 11% folate.

VEGETABLE KUGEL

⅓ cup pareve margarine or oil
3 onions, sliced
¼ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. each salt and pepper
2¼ cups grated raw potato
2¼ cups grated carrot
1½ cups grated tart apple
3 eggs, slightly beaten
¼ cup matzah meal
¾ tsp. grated lemon rind

In skillet, melt half of the margarine over medium-high heat; cook onions, stirring and adding up to 2 tbsp. water to prevent sticking, for 5 minutes. Add thyme, salt and pepper. Reduce heat to medium and cook, stirring often, for 15 minutes or until very soft and golden. Let cool for 5 minutes.

In bowl, stir together onion mixture, potato, carrot, apple, eggs, matzah meal and lemon rind. Pat gently into greased 8-inch square baking dish. Melt remaining margarine and drizzle over top. Bake at 325 for about 1 hour or until golden around edges. (Can be covered and refrigerated for up to 24 hours. Reheat in oven at 325 for 1 hour). Makes 8 servings. Per serving: about 212 calories, 5g protein, 10g total fat (2g sat. fat), 27g carbohydrate, 81mg cholesterol, 290mg sodium. Percent RDI: 3% calcium, 6% iron, 84% vit. A, 10% vit. C, 9% folate.

ORANGE CHOCOLATE CHIFFON CAKE

End the seder enjoyably with a light – not to mention attractively high – cake enriched with shards of chocolate and a fillip of orange flavouring.

1 cup ground pecans
3 tbsp. potato starch
¼ cup matzah cake meal
3 oz. bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped
1 tbsp. grated orange rind
2 tsp. instant espresso or coffee granules
9 eggs, separated
1 cup granulated sugar
Pinch salt

Lightly grease sides of 10-inch tube pan; line bottom with parchment or waxed paper. Set aside.

In small bowl, combine pecans, potato starch, cake meal, chocolate, orange rind and espresso; set aside.

In large bowl, beat yolk with half of the sugar for 5 minutes or until pale and thickened. In separate bowl and using clean beaters, beat whites with salt until soft peaks form. Beat in remaining sugar, 2 tbs. at a time, until stiff peaks form. Fold one-third of each of the egg white and pecan mixtures into egg yolk mixture. Repeat twice, folding just until some white streaks remain. Scrape into prepared pan.

Try to end the seder decadently

Bake in centre of oven at 350 for about 45 minutes or until puffed and top springs back when touched. Immediately invert pan onto legs or suspend over neck of bottle; let cool. Run thin knife around edges of cake to unmould. Remove bottom. Peel off parchment paper. (Cake can be stored in airtight container at room temperature for up to 2 days.) Makes 8 to 12 servings. Per each of 12 servings: about 240 calories, 7g protein, 13g total fat (3g saturated fat), 27g carbohydrate, 1g fibre, 161mg cholesterol, 49mg sodium. Percent RDI: 3% calcium, 11% iron, 7% vit. RAISIN CHICKEN: Sweeter than the heavens of invention.

LOW-FAT CHOCOLATE KISSES

Light as a breath, these sweet meringue cookies are perfect for any seder, whether it is a dairy or meat meal.

3 egg whites
Pinch of salt
¾ cup granulated sugar
¼ cup miniature semisweet chocolate chips
½ tsp. potato starch
½ tsp. vanilla

In bowl, using electric mixer, beat egg whites with salt until soft peaks form. Beat in sugar, 2 tbsp. at a time, until stiff and shiny. Sprinkle chocolate chips, potato starch and vanilla over top; gently fold into egg whites.

Using pastry bag fitted with a 1-inch opening, or 2 spoons, pipe 1-inch kisses onto 2 baking sheets lined with parchment paper or foil. Bake in oven at 300, rotating pans halfway through cooking time, for 25 to 30 minutes or just until firm to the touch. Let cool on racks. (Can be stored in an airtight container for up to 4 days.) Makes about 40 cookies. Per cookie: about 30 calories, negligible protein, 1g fat, 6g carbohydrate.

CHOCOLATE INDULGENCE CAKE

1 lb. semisweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
5 oz. margarine
4 large eggs, room temperature
1 tbsp. granulated sugar
1 tbsp. matzah cake meal

Melt chocolate and butter together. Cool. Combine sugar and eggs together and heat over water until sugar is melted. Beat with mixer at high speed until tripled in volume.

Sift cake meal over batter. Lighten the chocolate mixture and then fold in remaining egg mixture.

Pour into greased and floured (sprinkled with cake meal) 8½-inch springform pan.

Bake at 400 for 15-20 minutes until tester comes out slightly moist. Cool in pan.

PASSOVER SPONGE CAKE

Feathery light, this sponge cake is the perfect finale to a Passover meal. Garnish with orange slices and serve with blueberries, oranges, kiwi fruit and pineapple (ananas in French).

9 eggs, separated
1¼ cups granulated sugar
1 tbsp. finely grated orange rind
⅓ cup orange juice
⅔ cup potato starch
⅓ cup matzah cake meal
⅓ cup poppy seeds

In large bowl and using electric beaters, beat yolk with ½ cup of the sugar, orange rind and juice until pale and thickened, about 10 minutes. In separate bowl and using clean beaters, beat whites until soft peaks form; gradually beat in remaining sugar until stiff peaks form.

Sift together potato starch and matzah cake meal; stir in poppy seeds. Gently fold egg whites and potato starch mixture, one-third at a time, into yolk mixture until well blended. Pour into ungreased 10-inch tube pan. Bake at 325 for 50 to 60 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly touched. Turn pan upside down and let hang, on legs attached to pan or on inverted funnel, until completely cool. (Cake can be stored in airtight container for up to 2 days or frozen for up to 1 month.) Makes 8 servings.

Passover Food Ideas

Make charoset from around the world

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Surveys show that close to 100 percent of the Israeli Jewish population spends the night of the Passover seder (in Israel, we only have one!) with family and friends, recounting the miracles of the exodus from Egypt. Without exception, the days before Pesach are those of absolutely frenetic activity – every household is de-cluttered and scrubbed to within an inch of its life. Food to last for at least twice the holiday week is purchased, along with new clothes and afikoman gifts.

Scurrying and scrubbing, Jewish families all over the world are preparing the special seder plate used during the recitation of the Haggadah, the story of the exodus. Charoset, a paste that symbolizes the mortar and bricks in the exodus story, brings to mind the work done by the enslaved Israelites in Egypt.

Ashkenazi Jews – descendants of eastern European families – make an apple-nut-wine paste. The Sephardi customs practised by descendants of Spanish, North African and Turkish Jews incorporate other traditions, often using ingredients such as legumes, prohibited for their Ashkenazi cousins.

Traditional Yemenite charoset contains sesame seeds, dried dates and figs, ginger and dry wine, as well as hot peppers! Iraqi Jews, on the other hand, use a combination of almonds, walnuts and pine nuts. Moroccan-style charoset is made from chopped dates, pecans and almonds simmered together, then rolled into balls and sometimes wrapped in rose petals. Some North African Jews prefer a combination of pine nuts, hard-cooked egg whites, grated apple, sugar, ground almonds and walnuts, lemon juice, cinnamon and ginger.

Some communities add grapes, while others add pears, since the grated pears change the apple-walnut combination to the color of cement. There are those who actually grate a bit of brick into the charoset.

When following any of these recipes, think about double batching, for the leftover charoset can be enjoyed throughout the week of Passover as a side dish.

NORTH AFRICAN CHAROSET

2 oz. pine nuts
1 hard-boiled egg white
1 grated apple
½ cup sugar
½ cup chopped almonds
½ cup ground walnuts
Juice and zest of 1 lemon
Cinnamon
Ginger
Sweet red wine (optional)

Combine all ingredients, adding cinnamon and ginger to taste. Add wine, if desired. Cover well and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

TURKISH CHAROSET

20 pitted dates
1 cup raisins
1 cup coarsely ground walnuts
½ cup chopped almonds
Red wine

Combine all ingredients, adding wine as desired. Cover well and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

ITALIAN-STYLE CHAROSET

4 apples, peeled and chopped
6 cut-up dates
3 hard-boiled eggs
1 cup ground almonds
6 chopped walnuts
½ cup raisins
½ cup matzo meal
¼ cup lemon juice

Combine all ingredients. Cover well and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

TRADITIONAL MIDDLE EUROPEAN CHAROSET

2 large coarsely chopped or grated apples
½ cup chopped nuts
1 teaspoon cinnamon
Sweet red wine

Combine apples, nuts and cinnamon. Add enough wine to bind the mixture. Cover and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

Internet hate report released in Vancouver

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — After nine months of researching and writing a 198-page report about hate on the Internet, Robert Goldschmid couldn't help becoming personally and emotionally involved in the project.

Goldschmid, the author of a report called Promoting Equality in the Information Age: Dealing with Internet Hate, was in Vancouver recently speaking to media and various members of B.C. Jewish and multicultural organizations at the Jewish Community Centre. His report analyzes hate, hate speech and freedom of speech from both philosophical and legal perspectives.

"I knew [the project] was going to be overwhelming," said Goldschmid, a Victoria consultant and legal mediator. "It's impossible not to get personally involved in something one is working on. But it would have been much more troubling if I had to investigate the Web sites myself. You need counselling after something like that."

Goldschmid, chair of the community relations committee for the Jewish Federation of Victoria and Vancouver Island, was contracted by the Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific Region to examine and recommend a range of regulatory options to combat the spread of hate material on the Internet both nationally and internationally. It was a task that snowballed, he said.

"There were some days toward the end of writing the report that I just didn't want to open my own email because every day something new came up and had to be added. Finally I just said, 'This is enough,' and I had to finish writing the report," Goldschmid said.

His primary recommendation for the Canadian government is to apply the Canadian Human Rights Act to the Internet and to all future communications technologies.

"The Human Rights Commission already has expertise and experience in dealing with telephone and other transmissions of hate," he said. "Expanding this to hate on the Internet is a logical step."

Goldschmid's primary recommendation to the international community is to initiate an international agreement or a global standard to limit the worldwide spread of hate propaganda.

"It would be great to see the world adopt Canada's model for dealing with Internet hate," says the report. "However, because of differences in legal systems, cultures and values across the globe, the standard with the best chance of global acceptance is one that prohibits the spread of defamatory statements directed against certain identifiable groups. This is known as group libel law."

Goldschmid explained that the difference between a group libel standard and traditional hate speech laws is that truth would be a defence to group libel. While such a group libel standard will not prohibit expressions of hatred that are technically true, the acceptance of such an international standard may serve to prevent the spread of hatred and prejudice.

"Hate speech does not respond to counter-speech," Goldschmid said. "You can't counter with logic because hate speech is not factual – it's psychological."

The report will be presented to government organizations in the next few months, said Zena Simces, Chair, CJC, Pacific Region. "We don't have an exact timeline set, but it is a priority area."

Especially, said Simces, after learning that only an estimated five to 10 per cent of hate crimes are reported to police.

"Over 50% of the hate crimes reported involved racial bias with sexual orientation at 33% and religious bias at 10%, she said. "Causing serious concern is that of the religious crimes reported, 70% were anti-Semitic… It is disconcerting."

Funding for the report was provided by the 1999/2000 B.C. Anti-Racism and Multiculturalism Program, the Ministry Responsible for Multiculturalism and Immigration, and Canadian Heritage.

Goldschmid's recommendations

Goldschmid's list of recommendations for Canada:

- Apply the Canadian Human Rights Act to the Internet and future communication technology.
- Do not hold Internet content hosts, access providers and service providers liable for facilitating the transmission of illegal content unless they violate an order of a tribunal to remove the material.
- Provide liability for linking to hate sites, with appropriate exceptions.
- Provide that the mirroring of a site is equivalent to directly providing the content of a site.
- Amend the Criminal Code to include sexual orientation as a protected group.
- Encourage self-regulation and encourage all service providers, access providers and hosts to adopt acceptable use policies.
- Support non-government organizations that combat racism.
- Promote multiculturalism education.
- Consider a requirement to have service providers obtain and verify identifying information about their customers, which would not be released without a court order or order of the Human Rights Commission.
- Consider new legislation to deal with issues specific to the Internet.

The report's international recommendations:

- Initiate an international agreement to stop group libel on the Internet.
- Include content neutral restrictions in the international standard that would prevent the dissemination of speech such as threats, intimidation, and harassment, regardless of whether they are directed against identifiable groups.

Teachers' role 'pivotal' in success of Jewish education

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The most important investment Jewish schools can make is in their teachers.

Teachers are the "pivotal determinant" in the quality of education and must be the "bedrock priority" of Jewish education, said Joshua Elkin, executive director of Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE).

Launched in 1997, PEJE is a project through which leading philanthropists are contributing a total of $18 million US to improve Jewish day schools in the United States and Canada and to encourage greater enrolment.

Better recruitment of teachers, greater preparation during the early years of their career, and ongoing professional development will contribute more to the success of students than the many reforms now being pursued such as smaller classes, curriculum revision, new textbooks, or training more administrators, said Elkin, who headed a Jewish school for some 20 years.

Elkin, who is based in Boston, was the guest speaker at the launch of the Leanor Segal Chair in Jewish Studies at McGill University. Segal's endowment is a major boost for McGill's Jewish Teacher Training Program and paves the way for the future McGill University Institute for Jewish Education, which will expand graduate studies in Jewish education, while offering a firm grounding in practical teacher training.

"Teachers must be viewed as partners with parents in the raising of the next generation," Elkin said.

Children today are "starved for meaningful connection with adults," he said. "They are not getting enough attention; they need someone to take a real interest in them. They need mentors."

> 'Must be viewed as partners with parents in raising of next generation'

Students may forget the texts they read in school but they will remember a teacher who influenced them, he said.

Elkin stressed the value of the McGill program, not only for Montreal, but for Jewish education on the continent.

Jewish teacher training at the university level is sorely lacking in the United States, where only about 25 such teachers are graduated each year, resulting in a serious shortage. "McGill and York University [in Toronto] graduate more Jewish teachers than the entire United States," Elkin said.

"The synergy that exists in Montreal between donors, the university, and the community needs to be replicated in other cities.

"McGill is poised to be in the vanguard of a new era in the training of Jewish teachers for the entire continent."

The quality of the McGill program will attract more young people to teaching at Jewish schools and encourage them to stay in the profession, he said.

Gershon Hundert, chair of the McGill Jewish studies department, said the importance of Segal's donation and the money she is raising from other people in the Jewish community "cannot be exaggerated."

Only four years ago, the department was in financial trouble, and the teacher training program was in a "desperate" situation. Since then, Segal and Steven Cummings have set the department on a stable footing, he said.

McGill principal Bernard Shapiro said he was proud that within his tenure a "renaissance" of Jewish studies has taken place at the university. "Thanks to the generosity of many people, through donations large and small, the program has been put on a more solid and permanent basis."

Without revealing any timetable, Shapiro said he hoped to see the Institute for Jewish Education open in "the years immediately ahead."

Segal herself said she was spurred by the belief that the survival of the Jewish people in North America requires a "major upgrading of its educational resources.

"About 400 teaching positions at Jewish schools in North America open every year, yet there are fewer than 50 graduates from all of the teacher training programs," she said.

Segal paid tribute to the influence of teachers. "Over a career, a teacher will have 1,000 students, who will marry 1,000 others and have 1,000s more children among them."

A good teacher will instill in students the "self-knowledge" they need to be proud Jews, she said.

Eric Caplan, director of the Jewish Teacher Training Program, said the extra money should help fill some of the current "gaps" in its students' education, such as Hebrew fluency, Judaic text literacy, and deeper understanding of prayer and ritual.

"In the four years I have been director, it has been frustrating to see some of our graduates leave without all the skills they need," he said.

"We are already graduating some of the continent's best Jewish teachers. Now I think we can realize our full potential."

PM the passivist, not pacifist

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

In politics, there are two basic approaches to dealing with the challenges of the day. There are the interventionists (for example, Bill Clinton) who are driven to fiddle with everything, comment on any and every development and, in their spare time, initiate new projects and programs to improve government, the economy and society.

On the other end of the spectrum sit the passivists who consider notions like 'laissez faire' and 'steady as she goes' to be akin to divine dogma. Three-peat prime minister, Jean Chrétien, serves as the very definition of this political camp and in some respects, it is difficult to argue with the kind of success he has achieved.

But as we observe the flailing attempts of Joe Clark to fan the ebbing cinders of 'Shawinigate' into smoke and ultimately the kind of political fire that would burn the PM, it would be a mistake to assume that Chrétien the passivist is also Chrétien the pacifist.

It is true that on issues like the economy, the state of the Canadian federation and hiccups like the HRDC scandal, Jean Chrétien believes that time is the great equalizer and all will turn out well so long as the government stays cool and resists panic. This approach has, in fact, worked for the prime minister every single time political turmoil disturbed the calm waters on his watch.

At the end of the day, however, Chrétien is a street-smart, street-fighting kind of politician. He has already served notice to Joe Clark that the latter's attempts to sully his reputation will not be forgotten. Clark, noting that his attacks have won him media coverage disproportionate to his party's role in the House, has wrongly concluded that the prime minister has not retaliated simply because he is on the defensive.

Chrétien is biding his time in a display of his political acumen. All along, his real threat (even though it was not evident in the election result) has been Stockwell Day, who is of a younger generation. Currently, the Alliance leader is fully preoccupied trying to save his job and party so the PM has no compelling reason to 'help along' Day's burnout.

The moment, however, that the Day situation is resolved – one way or another'– Clark had better watch his back… and front. Chrétien is fond of talking about all the political wounds he has sustained over the years, but curiously modest about the ones he has inflicted (and there have been many). Clark is slated for a deep one that may very well hit the jugular.

Okanagan Jewish Community hosts weekend

KELOWNA, B.C. — The Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) recently hosted a weekend for 12 out-of-town guests from Vancouver and one from Spokane, Wash., at the OJC Centre.

At Friday night services, the community was led by Rabbi Charles Feinberg of Vancouver's Congregation Beth Israel and the synagogue's youth co-ordinator, Josh Berkenwald. Joining them were the rabbi's wife Krayna, Berkenwald's fiancée Dana, and a group of eight teenagers from the synagogue's youth group.

Dinner was hosted by OJC religious leader Sam Larry, after which an oneg Shabbat service was conducted by Rabbi Feinberg.

Saturday morning services, also led by Rabbi Feinberg, were very spirited as a result of the active participation of the visiting youth group. A traditional Kelowna potluck lunch followed. After the meal, the guests, along with many of the community members, headed for Big White, a local ski resort, where they were billeted by those who have condos in the area.

In his thank you speech, Larry joked about negotiations to make this visit a monthly occurrence.

Winnipeg's JCFS to celebrate 50th anniversary

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This year marks the 50th anniversary of the Jewish Child and Family Service. As part of the celebrations, the JCFS is producing a book – to be written by renowned Winnipeg educator Sybil Shack – highlighting the history of the organization.

"We want to get in touch with as many people as we can who have had an association with the agency either as employees, volunteers or clients," Shack says. "We are looking for anecdotes and photographs. While a brochure or pamphlet was considered, people often read them and throw them away. I suggested we write a small, softcover paperback that goes beyond the names and numbers."

The JCFS was formed in 1951 through an amalgamation of the Jewish Family Service Bureau of Winnipeg (formerly the United Hebrew Social Service Bureau) and the Jewish Children's Home. It was legally incorporated as a children's aid society looking after Jewish children in Manitoba. Throughout its history, JCFS has also welcomed, housed and helped to successfully integrate waves of Jewish immigrants into the community.

JCFS executive director Emily Shane reports that this year, the agency is looking forward to assisting another 65 families, mainly from the former Soviet Union.

"A lot are coming without any government help in place," Shane says. "For the past couple of years, the emphasis has been on family sponsorship with your family assuming responsibility for you. You have to be here for ten years before you become eligible for government benefits."

The agency also provides counselling services for families in crisis, helps those with psychiatric problems and supports the Jewish community chaplain.

Sybil Shack's own association with the types of services offered by the JCFS pre-dates the present organization. In the post-war years, she and her parents took in Jewish war orphans, notably John Hirsch, who went on to become a major figure in Canadian theatre.

After she retired from the education system in 1976, Shack joined the JCFS board and served on it for almost six years. She was invited back to serve on the 50th anniversary committee.

There is no deadline yet for completion of the book, she says.

Because she has become hard of hearing, Shack asks that readers either call Merrill Shwaid at the JCFS office at 204-477-7430, or fax Shack at 204-475-8024.

Anti-Israel ad angers mainstream Orthodox Jews

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, who promised a portfolio in a future cabinet on Jewish affairs to a Neturei Karta representative. A Neturei Karta guest railed against Israel at a "Saviour's Day" meeting of Louis Farrakhan's Nation of Islam in Chicago about a year ago, while also attacking Farrakhan's Jewish critics, the New Republic magazine reported.

Mainstream Orthodox sources take issue with just about every aspect of the ad's religious thinking. The talmudic and halachic citations in the ad have been misquoted or taken out of context, Rabbi Schochet stated. "Many barrels of ink have been spilled on that."

Israel is a country beset by problems, but "at the same time, we must give thanks to God for creation of Israel… That we still exist is a miracle of God," Rabbi Schochet said.

Angered by the ad, Rabbi Stern forwarded a letter to the National Post, which appeared one day after the quarter-page ad ran. "I wish to make it absolutely clear that this is a fringe group that has consistently opposed the State of Israel since its inception. It represents a small group whose views have been widely condemned and rejected by mainstream rabbis," the letter states.

In a letter to the Gazette, Rabbi Berzon called the ad the work of "a fringe group of Jewish self-haters, the worst anti-Semites we encounter." He told The CJN that in Montreal, "every rabbi is just climbing the walls" over the ad.

"Most upsetting to me is that it's almost a message to the gentile world: 'Guys, get together and destroy the State of Israel because we don't believe the state should exist until the coming of the Messiah.'"

Rabbi Berzon said Jewish organizations are considering boycotting Passover products under the group's rabbinic supervision.

Rabbi Stern speculated the ad was timed "to counteract the unity of the national unity government."

Ironically, he continued, the ad may galvanize support among the Jewish people for Israel.

Rabbi Schochet questioned why the ad sponsors wanted to "wash their dirty linen in public. A legal discussion should not be aired in the papers, especially when we need support for the Jews of Israel."

Rabbi Schochet speculated that the authors of the ad were attempting to ingratiate themselves with the Palestinian leadership at a time of crisis in Israel.

Rothschild was even stronger in his condemnation.

"To hold certain views is one thing, but to go the public press is an act of treason, of viciousness, at a time when the press is very negative on Israel and at a time that Israel is fighting for its survival."

New executive at CJC

He has served as national honorary counsel of CJC and has held numerous offices with the organization, at the regional and national levels. He was counsel for CJC at the Somalia Inquiry and at the Supreme Court of Canada in Human Rights Commission v. Malcolm Ross and New Brunswick Teachers Federation.

"I'm very grateful for the opportunity to serve the community, and I am particularly grateful for the confidence displayed in me by CJC and Federation. I am overwhelmed with messages of support," said Landy.

He said he hopes "to continue to ensure the Canadian Jewish community remains the most vibrant Jewish community outside of Israel."

Dorothy Zalcman Howard, the new national executive chair is currently chair of CJC, Quebec region, based in Montreal.

Zalcman Howard, who has been a professor, government official and human rights activist, is an organization consultant and trainer. She was a recipient of the CJC Monroe Abbey Young Leadership award.

Michael Elterman, a clinical psychologist and academic from Vancouver who is currently national secretary of CJC, has been acclaimed as associate chair of the national executive.

He has acted as Pacific regional chair, as national vice-president from Pacific region and as the CJC representative to the Canada-Israel Committee board.

The new treasurer, Cary Green, is a Toronto businessman who has served as an officer in the Ontario region of CJC and now serves on the national officers' committee as the national vice-president from Ontario. He also sits on the Toronto Advisory Board of the Salvation Army, Ontario central division.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, rabbi of Congregation Machzikei Hadas Synagogue in Ottawa has been nominated as secretary. He is the author or editor of 31 books, has written extensively for journals and newspapers, and has hosted a television series and a weekly radio call-in program.

Rabbi Bulka is a member of the CJC national executive and chair of the religious and interreligious affairs committee. He has served as chaplain of the Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion, chair of the religious advisory committee, United Way/Centraide of Ottawa-Carleton and member of the board of the Ottawa Regional Cancer Centre Foundation.

Honorary counsel will be Benjamin Zarnett, senior partner in the litigation department, Goodmans LLP in Toronto. He has served as honorary counsel of CJC Ontario region and honorary counsel for Jewish Mediation Services of Ontario.

EU increases pressure on PA to halt intifadah

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The lead story in last Sunday's Al-Hayat, the international Arabic-language newspaper published in London, reported that the contributing nations of the European Union (EU) are stepping up pressure on the Palestinian Authority (PA) to end the intifadah.

They will make any further economic assistance to the PA conditional on an end to violence, the report said. European Union special envoy Miguel Moratinos, Swedish foreign minister Anna Lindh and the EU's commissioner for external affairs Chris Patten will shortly meet with Israeli, Egyptian and Palestinian leaders.

The Al-Hayat correspondent quotes a diplomatic source as saying the EU representatives will "encourage both sides to restore quiet so that security and economic co-operation between them can be re-established."

The article noted that the EU and the United States have asked Israel to transfer funds it owes to the PA because they fear the PA will collapse.

The article also noted that the contributing countries are demanding "greater transparency" from the PA in expenditures and tighter supervision over the outlays of the Palestinian treasury. This comes "in addition to other steps to fight corruption and deficient administration" in the PA.

A "well-informed source" told the correspondent that these demands coming from the EU at a time when the PA is in the midst of a severe economic crisis, are tantamount to "diplomatic pressure on the PA because of its refusal to end the intifadah."

Arab funds are also being held up. The Palestinian ambassador to the Arab League, Mohammed Subeih, said yesterday the PA had received only $10 million (US) of the billion dollars promised them at the Cairo Arab summit in October.

"The mechanism to establish funds is excellent for investment companies but is unsuitable for a nation at war," Subeih said. "Arab countries committed to transfer $697 million to these funds, but only $260 million was deposited in the Islamic Development Bank, and only $10 million has been transferred to the PA and the Palestinian NGOs."

Education Minister vows to throw out 'post-Zionist' history textbook

By RELLY SA'AR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A controversial junior high school history book first introduced into the system when the National Religious Party had the education portfolio was criticized Sunday by an academic committee for "many failures in the way it presents the history of Israel."

The newly appointed education minister Limor Livnat, who has vowed "to sweep post-Zionism" out of the school system, used the committee report, presented by Tel Aviv University professor Yosef Gorney, to emphasize that under her direction, the ministry would "emphasize Jewish, national values." She vowed the book would be thrown out of the curriculum.

On Livnat's first day on the job last week, she fired the director general, who had been appointed by former Education Minister Yossi Sarid, from within the ranks of the top management of the ministry.

Limor Livnat

The committee slammed the book, A World of Changes, which was written inside the Education Ministry, for the way the book teaches students the history of the state before, during and after the War of Independence. The committee charges that on some issues, such as the peace process, the book does not give a balanced account.

Defenders of the book say it is not a history book of Israel, but of the nations of the world, and while Israel's story is part of that, the book's purpose is to introduce students to contemporary general history studies.

Livnat used the book as an example of the changes she wants to make at the ministry.

The book went to the academic committee after Likud and right wing MKs in the Knesset last year called it "scandalous" that a contemporary history book for Israeli students should not be more comprehensive about the birth and growth of the state of Israel.

Canada may boycot UN rights conference

the meeting, as it did two past world conferences on racism, which it described as "country-specific, polemic fests" that focused exclusively on Zionism and apartheid.

Lasalle, though, said he could not say whether Canada would attend the gathering if the issue was front and centre.

Canada would condemn any move to equate Zionism with racism, a spokesperson for Hedy Fry, Canada's secretary of state for multiculturalism who would lead the Canadian delegation, was quoted as saying last week. Fry is expected to unveil a major government initiative at the Durban meeting on combatting racism.

Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights and chair of a national advisory committee to Fry, is confident that the Zionism issue won't make the conference's agenda.

"I don't believe it will even make its way to a draft resolution" that was being prepared in Geneva this week for a followup meeting in May, Mock said. "It's unlikely."

Canada, she said, is working to get the issue removed from the agenda, but will be prepared if its efforts are unsuccessful.

"We are gravely concerned at the politicization of this," remarked Jack Silverstone, national executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress. "It has the potential of turning the whole event into a disaster."

However, "I do not believe – yet – that the resurrection of this odious resolution is a done deal by any stretch."

The UN General Assembly's 1975 passage of the infamous Zionism-equals-resolution is still fresh in the minds of many Canadians. Led by Arab, communist bloc and Third World states, the UN condemned Zionism "as a threat to world peace and security," and "a form of racism and racial discrimination."

Canada voted against the resolution and in the ensuing years, played a leading role behind the scenes in trying to have the measure overturned.

Finally, in 1991, the General Assembly repealed the resolution by a vote of 111-25. The move was hailed as a giant step forward for the UN and Israel.

This time, the current violence between Israel and the Palestinians is seen as giving the issue new life.

For its part, Congress, which has Non-Governmental Organization (NGO) status through its affiliation with the World Jewish Congress, promises it won't take part if the issue is prominent on the Durban conference's agenda.

The week in Israel

March 5

• German-brokered negotiations for the release of three Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah last fall have broken down, according to the soldiers' families.

March 6

• Israeli police concluded that a Palestinian who was severely beaten by Israeli civilians following Sunday's suicide bombing in Netanya was not connected to the terror attack. The man is a resident of the Nablus area who was in Israel illegally.

March 7

• Syrian President Bashar Assad rejected an offer from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to resume secret peace talks, according to the London-based newspaper, Asharq al-Awsat.

• Ten kibbutzim plan to transfer their housing to private ownership, following the lead of Kibbutz Gesher Haziv. Kibbutz lands will be divided among the members who will receive their houses and some adjacent land.

March 8

• Amnon Lipkin-Shahak and Uri Savir announ-ced they were quitting politics.

• Israeli press reported that U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell told Egypt that it is "in the best interest of stability in the region" for Egypt to return its ambassador to Israel.

March 9

• U.S President George W. Bush called Sharon to congratulate him on his inauguration and to invite him to the White House. Sharon accepted the invitation and will meet Bush on March 20. (Meanwhile, Colin Powell said earlier in the week that Bush is committed to moving the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.)

IDF: Arafat gives his blessing to all terror

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Military Intelligence head Maj.-Gen. Amos Malka said last week that Chairman Yasser Arafat and other Palestinian Authority (PA) leaders are giving their blessing to terrorist groups, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad, to commit acts of terrorism against Israel.

Malka, who appeared before the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, claimed that it did not matter which organization was behind each raid, since all of them were operating under the aegis of the PA.

Military Intelligence (MI) believes that the PA's inaction has fostered an atmosphere in which the various terrorist groups are utterly confident about their ability to pursue terrorist activity.

The MI director predicted that Israel could be looking at an intensification of the terrorist attacks, and greater sophistication of technique. Malka said there were indications that the terrorist groups in the territories were beginning to adopt the modus operandi of the Hezbollah in Lebanon.

At this stage, there are no signs of an imminent collapse of the PA. Arafat is still the source of authority, Malka said.

In Malka's assessment, Arafat and the PA will try to internationalize the conflict, including with direct appeals to the UN Security Council asking that steps be taken to protect the Palestinian people from Israel. Arafat will try to induce Israel to take harsh responses that would be viewed in the international arena as illegitimate. The MI head said that Arafat believes the Arab and international arena will not allow him to collapse, economically or otherwise.

Media obsession with Israel, cont'd

According to Reports

Last week's column dealt with the disproportionate attention Israel receives in the media. One reason given was that, being home to one of the largest bodies of foreign correspondents in the world, tiny, democratic Israel is a sitting duck for intense media scrutiny, especially when journalists have limited access elsewhere in the region. The result is that Israel is frequently judged far more harshly than are its non-democratic neighbours.

The other reasons for this media attention would require a complex analysis beyond the scope of this column. Still, in sketch form, a partial list would include the following:

• Israel's being the home of the three monotheistic religions, and the endless fascinations – and rivalries – as we see, for instance, in recent debates over the status of the Temple Mount;

• Israel's miraculous revival after a 2,000-year hiatus and its survival of five major wars;

• Israel's strategic location near the vital oil-fields of the Persian Gulf;

• the extent of anti-Americanism which negatively affects Israel as the dominant U.S. "client" state; and

• Israel's being the target of an ever-present, growing Arab assault on its legitimacy, an assault abetted by numerous pro-Arab voices in the West.

A recurring theme among Israel's harshest critics is the insistence that Jews, who have suffered so much hatred and oppression, are now oppressing another people, foremost by first daring to assert their own struggle for national liberation in their ancient homeland (Zionism) – a struggle Israel's opponents have viciously deformed as an expression of racism (the "Zionism is racism" canard); and secondly, by insisting that Israel's efforts to defend itself and its citizens amount to wanton aggression.

The Economist, which, as mentioned last week, raised the subject of the unbalanced media focus on Israel, suggested yet other reasons, including the West's "unbreakable" historical involvement: "From the Palestine Mandate to the Holocaust and beyond, Europe's responsibility is carved in stone."

Just what this sense of "responsibility" amounts to, how this is related to attitudes surrounding the Holocaust, and how these attitudes affect coverage of contemporary Israeli affairs, deserve detailed consideration.

Paris Jews worry about image after scandal

By JOSHUA SCHUSTER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — A major scandal has hit the heart of Paris' heavily Jewish clothing district.

The scandal involves an $80 million pyramid scheme, a media blitz surrounding the trial, 12 of the 124 accused fleeing to Israel, charges of anti-Semitism and one of France's most popular films.

The defendants, a majority of whom are Jews from Morocco and Tunisia who came to France in the 1960s, are store owners accused of having swindled French banks for loans to buy non-existent goods.

The affair blew open last month when a vast pyramid scheme, which some suggest has been going on for decades, came tumbling down after a series of bank loans were defaulted.

Several store owners who sell a variety of major fashion brands in small boutiques had sought loans to stabilize their faltering businesses, but were told they could secure the loans only if they proved business would pick up.

So the owners turned to friends and family in Sentier, a tight-knit community in central Paris. To obtain the bank loan, stores would sign a contract agreeing to buy a large amount of stock over a certain time.

But it turns out that the majority of stores who signed such contracts had no intention of purchasing the goods. When it came time to settle the loan, the next store would search out a new loan from another bank and a new contract from another store. The banks are accused of knowingly aiding the illegal process.

The scheme ended when police began searching for shop owners who had not paid their loans, prompting several of the accused to flee to other countries, including Switzerland and Israel.

The case took on a different tone as the French government accused Israel of knowingly harbouring fugitives, despite having signed an international extradition pact.

"By intentionally pursuing this policy, Israel removed itself from the family of nations," said French prosecutor Francois Franchy.

Israel responded that it had not received an official demand for extradition.

The trial opened recently without the presence of the 12 who are alleged to have fled to Israel.

While the French government has sent documents requesting the capture of the accused, it failed to include proper evidence of their guilt according to international standards, Israeli officials said.

"They have no one to blame but themselves," said Irit Kahn, director of the international department at the Israeli Justice Ministry, noting that France failed to resubmit their request after being informed of the proper guidelines.

However, the French prosecutor suggested during the trial that Israel is on a blacklist of 15 countries not cooperating in the war against money laundering.

Some French media outlets have chosen to press this aspect of the trial, with one television channel broadcasting a film titled Israel — A Criminal's Paradise.

This immediately raised outrage in the French Jewish community, which claimed such programs perpetuated anti-Semitism.

"They are putting all Jews in the same sack," said one Sentier store owner who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"The affair gives all of us a ridiculous and bad reputation," said a woman who requested anonymity, claiming she had seen the community treat others who were quoted in the media as betrayers and gossipers.

But some members of the Jewish community said they feel Israel should extend more cooperation in the case.

"In principle, I think that Israel has caused itself damage by harbouring criminals on its soil," said William Goldnadel, a well-respected French-Jewish attorney who represents one of the suspects.

The final ingredient in the scandal is a recently released film titled Would I Lie To You 2?

The comedy, which has achieved huge success at the French box office, features four Paris-based Jews from North Africa who work in the Sentier district. The Jews are cheated by a large European corporation, but react with bravado and charm to exact a just revenge in the end.

Though completely unrelated to the real Sentier affair, the French public has continually used one to refer to the other.

Said one store owner in the Sentier district, "Don't pay attention to the media and the trial. Better just go see Would I Lie To You 2?"

Syria on Security Council, growing concern for Israel

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The possible inclusion of Syria as one of the non-permanent members of the UN Security Council is becoming a growing concern in Israel, and Jerusalem is considering how to foil Syria's bid.

Syria's intent to be one of the 10 countries elected to the non-permanent position held for two years, has already garnered significant Arab, Asian and African support at the UN.

Recently, major international players, such as France, Russia and China – three of the five permanent members of the UN Security Council – have agreed to support the Syrian quest.

The Israeli ambassador to the UN, Yehuda Lancry, said recently that the candidacy of Syria contradicts article 23 of the international body's charter, which emphasizes that the candidates for Security Council membership must contribute to international peace and security.

The elections for the new grouping of non-permanent Security Council members is planned for November.

It has become a tradition at the Security Council that one Arab country is included among the non-permanent members. Currently, Tunisia holds the post.

It is unclear whether the U.S. will pose serious opposition to the Syrian bid. In the past, Washington placed serious obstacles to the inclusion of Arab countries in the Security Council because of their alleged involvement in terrorism.

During the 1990s, the UK and the U.S. succeeded in preventing the inclusion of Libya in the council, and supported the entry of Egypt as an alternative.

But Israeli sources say it may be difficult to suggest to the U.S. to implement a stance against the Syrian candidacy, because Syria has already participated in peace talks with Israel.

At this stage, Washington is not enthusiastic about taking on the UN in a struggle against Syria, particularly since the Bush administration is making efforts to rally Syrian support in a revived Arab coalition against Baghdad. However, active Jewish and Israeli lobbying may alter the situation by November.

A European Union source told Ha'aretz recently that Brussels will find it difficult to oppose the election of Syria.

New Polish law requires citizenship for compensation claims

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – A new Polish law makes Polish citizenship a criterion for claiming compensation for property seized by the Communists or the Nazis.

But Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski is unlikely to sign the law, stating that the citizenship condition was unacceptable to him.

The law requires anyone filing for compensation to have Polish citizenship as of the end of 1999.

In addition, the law limits compensation to 50 percent of the value of the asset, or if it is still held by the state, the return of the property. If the asset is held by a privatized state firm, compensation will be given in shares.

The chairman of the Association of Polish Jewry, attorney Aryeh Edelist, described the law as "anti-Jewish in its essence."

Edelist said the demand for proof of Polish citizenship as of the end of 1999 is particularly offensive to Jews.

"If there is a need to show proof of Polish citizenship, why not make do with citizenship as of [the day World War II started], September 1, 1939?" Edelist said.

Reports say leftist groups affiliated with President Kwasniewski are critical of the new law – not specifically because it harms Jewish interests, but because they are opposed to compensation of 50 percent.

The president's supporters say compensation should not exceed 10 percent, but they do not believe Polish citizenship should be a prerequisite.

Since the bill passed with less than a two-thirds majority, the president's signature is necessary for its ratification.

Kwasniewski did not explicitly pledge to veto the bill, but he recently voiced his concerns over it saying he "will not lend a hand to discrimination."

Kwasniewski is expected to exercise his power of veto by refusing to sign it.

The bill has provoked anger from Polish-born Jews and the international Jewish establishment, because making Polish citizenship a prerequisite will prevent most Polish-born Jews from making a restitution claim, as few now live in Poland.

The bill also states that property confiscated during the Nazi era and seized again during the period of Communist rule, will not be restored to its owners.

This clause affects Jews in particular, since many lost their property during the Nazi period. In many cases, all their relatives were also murdered, so the property is effectively heirless. But Kwasniewski's veto would repeal this too.

Israel's ambassador to Poland, Prof. Shevach Weiss, said, "The law, in its current format, is unjust. Even if it's obvious that not all the property can be restored, the expectation was that there would be some sensitivity to basic justice. The result of the voting strains attempts to renew the trust between the Jewish people and the Polish people."

Weiss noted he recently met with senior Polish officials to tell them about the serious consequences of the law, but his efforts were in vain.

In related developments, the Romanian government recently agreed to reinstate its law concerning the restitution of property seized during both the Communist and Nazi eras. It also extended the deadline for submitting restitution claims, which was scheduled to expire in June, for between six months and a year.

Pain management centre uses interdisciplinary approach

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Wasser Pain Management Centre at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital takes an interdisciplinary approach to chronic, non-malignant pain.

This does not include pain from a disease such as cancer, or acute pain, explained centre director and neurologist Allan Gordon. Rather, it deals with long-term symptoms such as headaches, and craniofacial pain.

A related component is the Chronic Pelvic Region Pain Unit, which opened officially in January. It is funded in part by Pharmacia Canada Inc., a research-based, pharmaceutical health-care company.

Physicians traditionally have not gone beyond their own specialty in treating patients, Gordon said. "Except for family doctors and in some cases internists, they don't look at the whole person. Maybe that is why alternative medicine is so popular today."

The Wasser Centre is trans-disciplinary, Gordon said. Included on the team are anesthesiologists, dentists, neurologists, nurses, psychiatrists, psychologists, gynecologists, otolaryngologists, medical imagers and pharmacists. Members of the University of Toronto departments of physiology and physical therapy and the faculties of nursing and dentistry are also involved.

Communication, both with each other and with the patient, is crucial, Gordon said, and is facilitated by team meetings and common charts that are used by all the disciplines the patient becomes involved with.

The hope is to develop a comprehensive database, both for ongoing individual patient care and for research purposes.

The issues around pain are complex, Gordon said. For instance, a person may have frequent headaches. The headaches may be combined with depression, or with medication abuse.

"We must understand what is really going on," he said.

In a recent study, one group of patients was given medication right away, while another spent an hour with a physician before getting the medication.

"The medication was more effective after the hour of consultation," Gordon said. Perhaps, he suggested, it is because the person feels validated – many have been told that because they look good, they can't feel miserable.

At the Mount Sinai Hospital

Gordon confessed to feeling skeptical about the growing popularity of acupuncture, calling its results more anecdotal than evidence-based. However, "in the last few years, every medical conference had something about alternative medicine, including acupuncture, so I gritted my teeth and looked into it."

When he found that some people indeed did better with acupuncture, he, along with Toronto's Mitchener Institute, decided to do a research study on it. "Mount Sinai is the first hospital to recognize its importance."

The study also pays tribute to the hospital's long-standing association with the Chinese community, Gordon said.

The centre plans to expand its use of alternative therapies, such as herbs, relaxation techniques, and hypnotherapy. "Some have not been proven, but we are open to looking at things."

Psychological tools are also used, such as group therapy, psychiatric intervention, and biofeedback.

The Pelvic Pain Unit will deal with a range of problems for both men and women. "Men do get pelvic pain, particularly in the penis, rectum and testicles, although it is not as common as women. They may have gone from doctor to doctor trying to get help, and feel just as invalidated as women do."

Eventually there will probably be a men's health centre, he predicted.

Women have traditionally been referred to gynecologists for pain in the pelvic area. Gynecologists treat the medical cause, such as endometriosis, where the tissue lining of the uterus grows outside of the uterus ("which is almost epidemic now"); interstitial cystitis, a chronic bladder disease; or pain on penetration; but they don't understand that pain is an important aspect of the problem – these women are expected to just deal with it.

Only one-quarter of the cost of the centre is paid for by OHIP, Gordon said. Much of the rest comes from donations and pharmaceutical company support. If the patient can afford it, he or she is asked to pay an administration fee and a fee for certain tests and x-rays.

Stem cells have potential to cure

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stem cells taken from blood in the umbilical cord have the potential to cure an increasing number of medical conditions, according to a recent panel discussion sponsored by Mount Sinai Hospital, UJA FEDERATION and the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Stem cells are immature cells, which, in the normal course of events, migrate to the bone marrow to produce blood cells: red blood cells, which carry oxygen, white blood cells that fight infection and platelets to help the blood clot.

If the bone marrow doesn't function properly, or is damaged by disease such as cancer, stem cells can be transfused into the bone marrow to create new, healthy cells.

Because the cell have not yet matured into bone marrow cells, there is less chance of graft-versus-host disease, a key cause of the body's rejection of any transplant.

Also because they have not yet matured, it is not necessary to have a perfect donor match. Readers will recall successive screenings and drives to find bone marrow donors for such people as Jay Feinberg, Alison Atlas, "Cathy," and Mark Hart. Atlas, Cathy and Hart passed away before a suitable donor could be found.

As well, bone marrow transplantation is difficult, calling for a general anesthetic.

Recent research, however, suggests that it will be possible to use these stem cells for other problems, such as liver and heart disease, autoimmune diseases such as lupus, arthritis, even AIDS, Parkinson's disease, solid cancers and diabetes.

Speakers at the lecture, titled The Tie that Binds, were Robert Casper, senior scientist at Mount Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute as well as professor and head of the division of reproductive sciences, department of obstetrics and gynecology, University of Toronto; Madeline Tonelli, program nurse, Toronto Cord Blood Banking Program, Mount Sinai Hospital; and the program's scientific director, Ian Rogers.

The Cord Blood Banking Program's medical director, Barbara Cruickshank, introduced the evening, and CBC Newsworld's Lorne Saxberg moderated.

Casper explained that the Canadian Bone Marrow Registry, which is linked to registries around the world, can match only about 60 percent of Caucasians. For ethnic groups, which includes Jews, it is even harder.

Scientists have begun to look for alternatives, which led to stem cell research. Unfortunately, Casper said, it has been hard to get enough of them. "There are lots of stem cells in the umbilical cords, and placental vessels, which are usually thrown away. From the cord, which is easily collected at birth, there are enough stem cells to repopulate the bone marrow of a child or a small adult."

Some researchers have tried to use cells from aborted or miscarried fetuses or "cast-offs from fertility clinics," said Casper, but there are many ethical questions surrounding such uses.

Rogers explained that research is being done to expand the number of stem cells, so that there will be enough to use to help others. The problem is, he said, that some begin to differentiate, which signals other cells in the sample to mature. "Mount Sinai is working on a bioreactor, which can remove the cells as they mature, so expansion can continue [in the other cells]."

Other research is being done in mice, changing stem cells to neural, liver and muscle tissues, Rogers said.

Tonelli explained that new parents can store their child's umbilical cord stem cells through the Toronto Cord Blood Program at Mount Sinai Hospital's Human Tissue Cryopreservation Laboratories. In this way, if their child or a sibling needs a bone marrow transplant, it will be there for them.

Between the 28th and 32nd weeks of pregnancy, interested people can register for the program by calling 416-586-8818, and requesting an information and registration package. A blood screening is carried out to detect, among other problems, prenatal hepatitis, HIV and hepatitis C.

At delivery, the hospital staff (or attendant at a home birth) collects the blood sample, and sends it to the cryopreservation lab. According to Rogers, it appears that the samples can be saved indefinitely.

Tonelli explained that the nominal fee is "for cost recovery only." Registration fee is $50, followed by a cost of $550 for processing and storage, including the first year storage charge. Following that, there is an annual fee of $100.

If there is a demonstrated medical need (for instance, if a sibling has a potentially immediate need for a bone marrow transplant), the fee is waived, except for the yearly storage fee.

TORONTO — Cantor Morris Soberman, who died on April 1, 1999, was the baal koreh, chazzan sheini, and renowned teacher of more than 3,000 bar and bat mitzvah students at the Beth Tzedec Congregation for more than 30 years.

His son, Allan Soberman, recently produced a compilation CD of his father's prayers and davening from tapes titled, Cantor Morris Soberman: A Dedication.

Allan is a professional musician who toured Canada and the United States with Dan Hill, Stringband and others. He says that his musical experience "enabled me to put together a wonderful tribute to my father."

Along with his father's voice, Allan has added his voice, re-recorded 30 times, to add a choir as background to Menucha Vesimcha. One melody was recorded with his father when Allan was 11 years old.

The CD's first selection is Sheva Brachot at a wedding ceremony in 1971 followed by mizmor shir which father and son recorded in 1961 for the family.

There are some 16 prayers, Torah readings, kiddush for Sabbath morning, as well as words of tribute to the cantor recorded at a Beth Tzedec dinner in his honor in 1983.

"My mother Tillie had many records of my father's voice and recently she found a bag of reel-to-reel recording tapes of my father's styles and melodies for Torah reading. She helped fund the production of the CD, and we have contacted the synagogue. The CD is earmarked for a fundraising project," Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader says.

"Cantor Moshe Soberman was a man who passionately wanted to be of assistance to others. Many can recall his offers to help a child with an extra lesson or an adult with a private tutorial.

"He kindled candles of love, devotion and joy. He had a mission in life and God bless him to be able to fulfill that sacred task. He was a faithful servant of God."

Soberman served at the Goel Tzedec Synagogue, the predecessor to Beth Tzedec. He awoke at 5 a.m. and walked four miles to University Ave. on Saturday mornings to lead the services.

For more information about Cantor Soberman's CD, call Allan Soberman (416) 784-5140 or email sobes@idirect.com.

Concerts of Jewish history at the ROM

TORONTO — Cantor Ron Graner will present two consecutive Sunday afternoon concerts at the Royal Ontario Museum that will project a panorama of Jewish history to the present day.

On March 25 at 1 p.m., in a program titled Musical Pawns, Graner will be joined by soprano Steliana Hindalova. They will perform music that has not been heard for more than 80 years. Graner will contrast the lives and music of Jewish composer David Nowakowsky (1848-1921) and Orthodox Christian composer Mykolos Leontovich (1877-1921), who was murdered by the Cheka (secret police) under the orders of Josef Stalin.

Cantor Ron Graner

The afternoon will also include a video presentation of the 1908 inaugural concert of the Jewish Music Society of St. Petersburg performed by Cantor Louis Danto, a society originally formed by Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Anton Rubinstein.

On April 1 at 1 p.m., Graner, an Ashkenazi, will be joined by Sephardi Cantor Aaron Bensousson of Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue, and composer/songwriter Penny Blake to present From Genesis to Gershwin, a musical tour that will span 2,000 years of Jewish music culled from many lands in which Jews have lived.

The sacred and secular music will reflect life in Israel, Spain, Europe and North America, in Ladino, Yiddish, Egyptian, Syrian and Romanian.

Graner, a baritone, has performed in opera and musical comedy, as a cantor and a solo performer. He is also an educator. He studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music, where he was awarded a scholarship at the conservatory's opera school. He sang with the Festival Singers of Canada.

Graner studied at Hebrew Union College in New York and at Yeshiva University. He spent four years in Israel, where he was a soloist with the National Chamber Choir.

Since 1989, he has been involved in the Nowakowsky Project, which attempts to bring forward the music of composers whose lives and works have been virtually wiped off the face of the earth by Bolshevik and Nazi oppression.

Along with his love of music, Graner is an industrial/commercial investment real estate agent and a documentary producer.

Admission to each concert is $12 for ROM members; seniors and students are $10. For tickets or more information, call 416-586-5797 or 1-800-771-3933.—C.G.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED FOR ARCHEOLOGICAL DIG AT YAVNEH-YAM

A wonderful educational experience awaits those who enrol in the sixth season of excavations at Yavneh-Yam, an archeological project on the Mediterranean coast of Israel, midway between Tel Aviv-Jaffa and Ashdod.

The project is headed by Moshe Fischer, a professor of classical studies at Tel Aviv University. Its focus is to research the nature of the encounter and conflict between Near Eastern civilizations and the Greek and Roman culture on the coast of Eretz Yisrael through the ages. Over the previous five seasons, volunteers have unearthed artifacts from the Iron Age to the Middle Ages.

A training dig for students and enthusiasts from Israel and abroad, the 2001 season is divided into three terms of two weeks each, from July 8 to Aug. 17. The fee per term is $700 US, including a non-refundable application fee of $50. It includes full-board accommodation at the modern Youth Village Ayanoth, a lecture series on archeology, geography and history of the Holy Land, field trips and more. (Travel to Israel and insurance are not included.)

For details, contact Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, 416-787-9930, e-mail cftau@interlog.com; or call Prof. Fischer, 00972-3-6409938, e-mail fischer@post.tau.ac.il.

English Architecture: When one travels a country, one encounters its architecture, and a nation's history and character are often reflected in its buildings and other manmade structures.

Buildings of Delight: 100 English Masterpieces, by Alec Clifton-Taylor, presents a diverse range of English architecture, offering both textual description and many photographs in colour and black and white. Clifton-Taylor's focus is not just the majestic castles and aristocratic homes that grace England; bridges, mills, farmhouses and even railway stations also come under his penetrating eye.

Buildings of Delight is a useful companion to those who have travelled the English countryside and want to know more about its various treasures of brick, wood and stone. Published by Orion House, the large-format softcover book is available in bookstores for $34.95.

RUTH WISSE NOMINATED FOR $10,000 KORET PRIZE

Yiddish scholar Ruth R. Wisse, formerly of Montreal, has been named as a finalist in the international Koret Jewish Book Awards competition. The top prize in each of four categories is $10,000 (US).

Wisse, a professor of comparative literature at Harvard, was nominated for her recent book, The Modern Jewish Canon: A Journey Through Language and Culture, published by The Free Press. The book addresses the complex question: What makes a great Jewish book?

Raised in Montreal, Wisse attended the Yiddishe Folkshul (Jewish People's School) and became the first professor to introduce courses in Yiddish literature at both McGill and Harvard universities.

Ruth Wisse

Established three years ago by the San Francisco-based Koret Foundation in co-operation with the National Foundation for Jewish Culture of New York, the Koret Jewish Book Awards culminate in April with a ceremony in New York at which Pulitzer Prize-winning Maus artist Art Spiegelman is to be the featured speaker.

Wisse was nominated in the biography, autobiography and literary studies category. Other contenders in the same category are Naomi W. Cohen for Jacob H. Schiff: A Study in American Jewish Leadership; Sidra DeKoven Ezrahi for Booking Passage: Exile and Homecoming in the Modern Jewish Imagination; and Cynthia Ozick for Quarrel & Quandary, a book of essays.

Competing for the fiction prize are Saul Bellow for his novel Ravelstein; Philip Roth for The Human Stain; Myla Goldberg for Bee Season: A Novel; and Daniel Stern for One Day's Perfect Weather: More Twice Told Tales. Prizes are also awarded in the categories of history, and philosophy and thought.

Yana's Friends released on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two outstanding films that premiered at last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival have finally arrived on video. As is frequently the case with specialty and foreign films, they may be difficult to locate, but they are both available to your video store through Canada's largest video distributor, Video One.

One of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival's most successful screenings last year was the hilarious comedy, Yana's Friends, that was shown on opening night.

This is a delightful film that takes a quirky look at the massive influx of Russian immigrants into Israel over the past decade and how they have changed Israeli society.

Yana, the main character upon whom the film focuses, arrives in Israel with her husband. As soon as the couple rent an apartment, the husband abandons her and returns to Russia with the money they received from the Israeli government to help them establish themselves.

Yana and Eli, with whom she shares the apartment, subsequently become very friendly, especially at the time of the Scud missiles attacks during the Gulf War.

In the midst of all this, another newly arrived Russian family moves into the building, the landlady suddenly gets caught up in all the shenanigans and Yana discovers that she is pregnant.

Yana's Friends is a wonderful amalgam of comedy, romance and soap opera that works well to create a very entertaining film.

At the moment, Yana's Friends is only available at rental prices and Mongrel Media expects copies of the video to be available at the following video stores in Toronto, among others: Videoflicks on Avenue Road, Revue Video on the Danforth, Queen Video and Suspect Video downtown, Very Video at Yonge and St. Clair and Hollywood Movies in Thornhill.

Evelyne Kaplun who plays Yana in Yana's Friends

Jew-Boy Levi is a fascinating German film that has also just arrived on video. It too was successfully screened at last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

This film is set in a small German village in 1935. Levi is a cattle trader who visits the village every year to buy calves and to try to win the hand of Lisbeth, the young lady who works in the local pub. This particular year, a Nazi engineer from Berlin is in the village to repair a tunnel. He and his work team bring the prejudices and anti-Semitism of the outside world into the village, disrupting the tranquillity of the region.

Jew-Boy Levi is a first-rate production that has been released on video by Vid Canada and should be available to any video retailer who wishes to order it.

In addition to the above videos, we also have Quest For The Lost Tribes, an interesting film by award-winning Toronto filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, that tries to solve a 2,700-year-old mystery.

The film takes the viewer to remote and exotic locations, in order to find the answers to the questions surrounding the disappearance of the 10 tribes of Israel who inhabited the Kingdom of Israel.

Does Jacobovici come up with the answers? You will have to make up your own mind after you have seen the film. I'm not convinced that he does, but Jacobovici does present a forceful case.

Quest For The Lost Tribes has been released by SMA Distribution, the company which releases most A & E video products in Canada and is available at a low sell-through price.

Ne'imot Singers depict Israeli life through song

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Ne'imot Singers, an amateur group of vocalists who pay an annual fee just for the privilege of singing together, have a busy schedule of performances this spring.

On April 2, the choir will be performing at a tribute dinner sponsored by the Haifa Foundation for Dr. Arnold Noyek, otolaryngologist-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital. On April 12, they will be featured at a special concert at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue.

The choir's musical director is Russian-born Klara Bagley, who lived in Israel before immigrating to Canada. The only professional in the group, she does some of the arrangements for the singers.

"She is very talented and devoted," says David Israel, a member of the group. "We have great respect for her and her talent."

The choir performs a variety of music, including Ladino, Yemenite and Yiddish songs, as well as Hebrew lyrics to Russian melodies.

Nevertheless, their emphasis is on Israeli music. The choir's Israeli repertoire includes everything from the songs of the chalutzim – the pioneers who came from Eastern Europe – to the songs of the Palmach and contemporary Israeli composers.

"We perform the music of the various groups that form Israeli society," and sing many songs about Jerusalem, Israel says.

The Ne'imot Singers was founded in 1988 by musician Dorin Ophir in order to depict Israeli contemporary and traditional life through song. The choir has appeared throughout the Toronto area, at such venues and events as the Jerusalem Pavilion at Caravan, Carabram, Yom Hashoah Memorial, Yom Hazikaron Memorial and numerous others.

For more information on The Ne'imot Singers and their performances, call Francesca David at 905-770-4720 or fax her at 905-770-5300.

BENJAMIN'S PARK MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Austrian to sue Haider for 'anti-Semitic strategy'

By YAIR ETTINGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — With regional elections only two weeks away, Joerg Haider, the de facto head of Austria's Freedom Party, has found himself embroiled in a new scandal over his blunt verbal attacks on a leading Austrian Jew.

Ariel Musikant, the president of Austria's Jewish community, plans to sue Haider for what he terms the politician's anti-Semitic attacks. Musikant told Ha'aretz that Haider is conducting an "anti-Semitic strategy" – a crime for which, under Austrian law, the maximum penalty is 10 years in prison.

The immediate cause of Musikant's suit is a statement Haider made at a Freedom Party rally recently. "I don't understand how a man with the name of Ariel can be encrusted with so much dirt," Haider told the 2,000 people present, playing on the fact that Ariel is also the name of a well-known Austrian cleaning supply company.

Haider also attacked several non-Jewish figures at this rally, including French President Jacques Chirac, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer. But only 10 days later did Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel condemn the speech.

That same day, at a Freedom Party conference in Vienna, Haider repeated his remarks. "Musikant is not worthy of the name of Ariel," he said, to applause from the crowd. Haider added that Musikant, who owns a real estate investment firm, is a "speculator" who makes profits thanks to his ties with the authorities in Vienna.

But Musikant's lawsuit, which will be filed in the coming days, also includes a number of other statments made by Haider over the last few weeks. For instance, Haider attacked American political consultant Stanley Greenburg, whose services were hired by Austria's Social Democratic Party, saying that Austria does not need "spin doctors from the East Coast" – a clear reference to the Jews, Musikant said.

Haider declined to be interviewed by Ha'aretz.

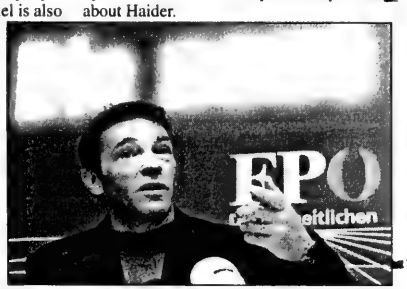
Schuessel, meanwhile, has been absorbing heavy criticism in the Austrian media for having done "too little, too late" to respond to Haider's comments. He was supposed to have participated in an international conference on "Memory in the 20th century," but unexpectedly canceled – a move which one conference organizer charged was motivated by his desire to avoid unpleasant questions about Haider.



Joerg Haider

The United States and the European Union had originally imposed sanctions on Austria after the Freedom Party joined the governing coalition, though these were gradually lifted after Haider formally resigned as head of the party. Israel has still not returned its ambassador to Vienna.

Political analysts say that Haider's attacks were motivated by his party's poor showing in the pre-election polls, which predict that the Freedom Party will get only 18 to 22 percent of the vote (it currently holds 29 of the parliament's 100 seats).

Iraqi 'Palestine' volunteers head for training

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BAGHDAD — A second group of Iraqis vowing to liberate "all of Palestine" bid their families emotional farewells as they left for military training Sunday, allowing President Saddam Hussein to cast himself as the defender of Jerusalem just as Arab leaders were meeting to discuss their stand on both Israel and Iraq.

Crowds of volunteers for the so-called Jerusalem Army chanted "with our blood and souls... we sacrifice for Saddam" before their wives and children kissed them goodbye.

In October, Saddam had called for volunteers for the Jerusalem Army, responding to the outbreak of the intifadah the month before.

In Baghdad, the first group of the Jerusalem Army volunteers left for training Saturday in a nationally televised sendoff similar to Sunday's event. The official Iraqi News Agency says more than 7 million men and women – nearly a third of the 22 million population – volunteered for the force. It was unknown how many were in the first groups to be trained, but the figure appeared to be in the thousands. It was also not clear what the volunteers would do once their training was completed.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak has ridiculed calls for war.

Arab foreign ministers discussed the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process in the Egyptian capital yesterday as they prepared for an Arab League summit later this month in Amman, Jordan. The Cairo talks and the Amman summit were also expected to focus on calls to end the isolation Iraq has suffered since its invasion of Kuwait and its forced retreat in the Gulf War.
